Mr. TELLER. That is what I understood. The matter has been much discussed and was discussed in the convention held in Denver. Mr. Pinchot denied there the statement I have made here. He subsequently took it back, when the proof was such that he could not any longer dispute it.

I have some memorandum that I wanted to present, but I do not believe I shall be able to do so to-night, and I do not intend further to inflict myself on the Senate with this question. So perhaps I shall leave out some things that I intended to say.

I have this other complaint which I want to make. From time immemorial, that is, ever since we can remember as a nation, the right of the community to make public roads upon public and private lands has been recognized. The State of Illinois asserted the right, which no man ever disputed, to build roads on the section lines. The circuit court, with Judge McLean presiding, way back before many Senators were born, declared that the State had an unquestioned right to condemn if necessary the public lands for this purpose. I have never known an acre of public land to be condemned for this purpose. I have always known, since I have been in the West, roads made across the public lands without any objection on the part of the General Government; and I will venture to say the Senator from Oregon will bear me out that that has been the custom. McLean said that that was one of the rights of the State, and that if the Government did not concede it, the State could condemn the land.

Judge McCrary, who was the circuit judge of the eighth circuit, as you will recollect, and a former Member of Congress, declared that when the State of Illinois—I think it was Illinois—granted a right of way for a railroad in the State it followed that it went across the public lands, and that they got a right of way across it like any dirt road would. I have these citations here, but I will not stop to read them.

Mr. President, there are several other things to which I wanted to call attention. I have here the timber cut of this country, taken from the census report. In the State of Colorado from 1880 to 1906, inclusive, twenty-six years, the total amount of lumber cut was 2,640,000 feet, board measure, or a trifle over 100,000 feet per annum. That is less than a thousand feet to the square mile. It does not appear that we were denuding the forests very rapidly. In Maine the cut was 17,000,000 feet in the same time. In Iowa, with the little forests they have, there were cut 11,000,000 feet; in Michigan, 93,000,000 feet. We heard to-day how Michigan had wasted her fine lumber. Minnesota cut 38,000,000 feet. Montana cut during that time 3,757,000 feet. Wisconsin cut during that time 70,000,000 feet. Pennsylvania cut 53,000,000 feet.

Mr. President, Congress may take charge of the forests of the West, but I do not think it will take charge of the forests of Pennsylvania. I do not think we have yet reached a time when it will be claimed that the Pennsylvania people can not take care of their own interests, and that a man owning a forest there can not cut it to suit himself. New Hampshire cut 10,000,000; Vermont 9,000,000; New England, during those twenty-six years, cut 44,000,000 feet, while the Pacific coast, including Colorado, has cut 58,000,000 feet.

I had a statement of the prophecies made about this matter, showing the estimates made by the Census Department from year to year, and how fallacious they have been. When some man gets up and tells me how much timber there is in the United States and how long it will take before it is gone, I simply want to say that in nine cases out of ten he does not know anything about it. As the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] said, there is now more timber in some sections of the country than there was when the country was settled.

Mr. President, I do not suppose I need to say here, but I ought to say it for the benefit of the Department that has charge of this matter, that it is not possible for Congress or the President or any power whatever to take away the sovereignty of a State over one acre of its lands. The Supreme Court of the United States has declared that the Constitution of the United States was intended as much to protect the State as it was to protect the individuals or to protect the General Government. Without States you can not have a General Government, and as you minimize and reduce the affection of the people for their State, so you reduce and minimize their affection for the General Government. We will be proud of the General Government when it is composed of States of the right kind and of the right character.

As I said not long ago—and I want to repeat it—you can not abolish States rights. I mean some day to present some authorities on this subject. I will not do it to-night. I said yesterday that the most critical period in the history of the country is to-day, more so than it was when the war closed. Executive power and legislative power also are rampant, and State lines and States rights are at a discount.

Mr. President, the old constitution of the State of Massachusetts had in it a provision, which I will not attempt to quote exactly. The Senator from Massachusetts may be able to correct me. It is necessary to have a frequent recurrence to the great principles that underlie this Government. Other writers have said the same thing; and does anybody need to say that an occasional return to the principles upon which this Government was founded is necessary for the purpose of keeping the relation between the States and the General Government intact and as it was intended?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me, in the presence of one of the Senators from Massachusetts, to quote another sentiment that is in the constitution of Massachusetts; and I think I can quote the exact words?

Mr. TELLER. I referred to the old and first constitution. I do not know what is in the modern constitution.

Mr. BACON. I think Massachusetts has had only one.

Mr. LODGE. We are still living under the constitution of 1780.

Mr. TELLER. It is a good constitution.

Mr. BACON. In that there is this quotation, as I recall it:

To the end it may be a government of laws, and not of men.

Mr. TELLER. I remember that, and on more than one occasion the Supreme Court has reiterated the doctrine that this is a government of laws and not of men, and the Supreme Court has said, too, in so many words, not mincing words, that this is "an indestructible Union composed of indestructible States;" and Marshall said that "a man in his wildest dreams would not think of abolishing State lines." He was not what one would call, in modern days, a "States rights man."

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to say to the Senator that the constitution of North Carolina, I think, has been changed three times, and always has had this in it:

A frequent recurrence to fundamental principles is absolutely necessary to preserve the blessings of liberty.

Mr. TELLER. I think that ought to be in every constitution. We have lived as a nation nearly one hundred and twenty years. We have lived because we had this theory: The General Government for general governmental affairs; the States for local affairs. I do not myself find any authority for the Government of the United States to go into the wood business or to sell timber to the people of my State. I do not find any authority for them to charge a poor settler, whose cattle run out on the public lands, for grazing privileges and grazing rights, and saying, as some forest ranger may say, "You may put fifty head and the other man may put on a hundred head, provided you pay so and so." Mr. President, free commons——

Mr. FULTON. May I ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. Right here I wish to call his attention to another practice of this Bureau in the administration of the forest reserves. There are settlers along the outside lines of the reserves, of course, and numerous settlers, who have small bands of stock. They turn their stock out in the spring. Naturally they wander off on the reserves, or some of them do. If that happens, the stock are arrested and impounded, and the settlers have imposed upon them a fine.

Last spring one settler living right near a forest reserve—within a mile of it, I think, or less than a mile—turned his stock out. Under the laws of the State he had a perfect right to do it. He turned them at large because we have there a fence law. The stock, or a few head of them, wandered off on the reserve. They were arrested and impounded, and a fine of $50 was imposed on this rancher. They had no right to do it, of course. But they said, "You will either pay this fine or you will not hereafter be allowed to range any stock, even by paying for it, on this reserve."

Mr. TELLER. That has occurred repeatedly in my State.

Mr. DIXON. I wish to say——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DIXON. I wish to say in connection with the statement the Senator from Oregon now makes that a similar case was brought in the Federal court in Montana. The local district court held that under the law, not as the Forest Service fixed it, but as Congress passed it, stock trespassing on a forest reserve were liable to the tax, and that case on appeal was sustained by the circuit court in San Francisco. I think, in justice to the forest-reserve movement, we should not lay it on the forest-reserve officials, but to the law as regarded by the Federal courts.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator from Colorado will allow me, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if the case he cites is not an altogether different case from the case which the Senator from Oregon cites? Was not the case in Montana one of willful trespass? Was it not a case where a man had leased 160 acres of land from a private owner in a forest reserve and turned his cattle in and then willfully destroyed the fence, so that his cattle went on the forest reserve, and it was a willful trespass?

Mr. DIXON. No; the Montana case came up expressly on the question whether they were obliged to fence.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I think the Senator from Montana is mistaken in regard to the facts in that case. I do not think it was a case where cattle were turned at large without being driven on the reserve, where they were simply going at large, according to the laws of the State. I know that the court in Montana has held a different rule from what has been held by all the other district judges on this question.

Mr. TELLER. They held differently in the State of Washington.

Mr. FULTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. The Supreme Court of the United States settled that proposition, and the Senator from Idaho presented it to the Senate. It is in 133 United States Reports, I think.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think it is.

Mr. TELLER. That was a case where a company had bought a large amount of land—railroad land, I presume—and went into court to prevent parties from pasturing on the public land, because, they said, the cattle were coming on their land; and Judge Miller decided that an action would not lie, that there was no equity in it. It was an equity case, for an injunction. The case is worthy of being read by Senators. The court then went into a history of the whole question and declared that from time immemorial in this country—that is, from the beginning—that had been a recognized right by the Government itself and by the States.

I took up that question the other day after the Senator from Idaho had made his speech. I went through several States and I found that the States as a rule had declared that unfenced land was open for public pasture. Massachusetts held it, Connecticut held it, and in my State we have always held it. If I have 160 acres of land and I do not fence it, any man can pasture his cattle on it who sees fit.

Mr. President, the right of commons was a right that belonged to every Englishman until the time arrived when the lands became valuable and finally they were fenced up. All lands in England at all times have been public lands and open to pasture by anybody who had stock until they were fenced. I do not suppose there has been any land of that kind for a great many years, and the Supreme Court has settled that proposition beyond a question.

Mr. President, at the expense of wearying the Senate, I want to make one other statement. There has been something said about the interference of these forest rangers with the proceedings of conventions, and so forth. The Senator from Idaho made an inquiry of the Chief Forester, Mr. Pinchot, as to who had attended conventions at the expense of the United States. I have the report on my table. Mr. Pinchot says it will take some time to get the facts, and of course until that time he can not do it; and then he enters upon a defense of the forest-reserve system, which I do not care about bothering with.

Last summer, in June, there was what was called a "land convention" in the city of Denver. It was called by an act of the legislature of Colorado, a Republican legislature, with a Republican governor. The Republican governor was directed to ask the neighboring governors to attend a convention and to provide how the delegates should be elected. The governors of all the Western States appointed delegates. Anyway, they appointed some gentlemen who were to determine the method of carrying out the act, and they provided that certain boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and so forth, might send delegates to this convention.

When the convention met there were 740 people in it. It was a very respectable convention. There were a great many people there who had been settlers for a long time in that country. All of them had interests in it. The committee on credentials met and accepted the credentials and issued a ticket to every man who was entitled to sit in the convention.

The convention met at 9 o'clock in the morning, and before noon the convention was full of men who had practically the same ticket, but not the same kind, gotten up for the occasion, and the forest rangers or people who were in sympathy with them came in. The committee immediately provided that the next morning there should be a different ticket. Those gentlemen the next morning were excluded from the convention. They had no business there under the call, and, of course, when they could not get inside the convention we did not have any further trouble with them. It was said there were a hundred of them there. I do not know how many were there.

I think there are Senators here who will agree with me as to what they have done in certain conventions. I think there was one in Idaho a couple of years ago where they went in in force and dominated the convention. Mr. President, they did not dominate ours. There were 700 men there, reputable men, men who knew what their rights were, and who, if necessary, would themselves have enforced them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator from Colorado will pardon me, I will suggest that they only tried to dominate the Idaho convention. They did not make a success of it.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, they did not? I thought they did.

Mr. HEYBURN. They thought they did for a while.

Mr. TELLER. They claimed to have made a great success of it.

When this convention quit, we passed some resolutions. They were mild resolutions. The convention said they did not approve of this forestry system. They did not call anybody a thief or a vagabond. The temper of the convention was pretty highly strung. I think it would not have been very difficult to have gotten some very savage resolutions through, but having made some remarks to the convention I said I hoped that when they got their resolutions ready they would provide moderate resolutions and such as could not be excepted to by anybody. This they did.

Thereupon a forest ranger who was not in the convention, at least, interviewed the newspapers and declared that we were beaten in the convention, and that they could have just as well had an indorsement of it.

Mr. President, I believe I could have secured a condemnation in that convention by the slightest effort in words that would have been very unpleasant to the Department. We did not do that. Of course there were some people who were friendly to the forest-reserve system. There were some great cattlemen there who wanted the leasing of the public land, who wanted to shut out the common farmer and the man with forty head of cattle.

There were men there who had thousands of head of cattle, and they made a determined effort, but that was voted down. The Senator who sits here beside me [Mr. CLARK of Wyoming] was at that convention. He knows exactly what took place. As far as we could we condemned the forest-reserve administration. I do not mean to say that all the people who condemned the administration were opposed to forest reserves, because there are thousands of people who are criticising the administration of the forest reserve who are friendly to the system.

Mr. President, I have here a matter I want to call attention to which I think bears a little on what I have been talking about. This is from Mr. Pinchot, and it is in the RECORD, having been put in the other day. He says:

> The attendance of forest officers at public meetings in the West was investigated last year by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture. The policy which I explained then is the same that obtains now. When considerable bodies of users of the national forests come together it is the custom of the Forest Service to meet them, almost invariably at their own request, for discussion of policies and settlement of difficulties, and in consultation with local people to devise methods of administration calculated to make the national forests more useful and more easily used. I believe this is a good thing to do, and I propose to continue it unless otherwise ordered. I can see no reason why the people of the West should not be entitled to know at first hand what the Forest Service is doing and to have their complaints, criticisms, and suggestions considered and discussed with them, both by the local forest officers and the men from Washington.

Great heavens, Mr. President, we know more about it than we get from the forest rangers! We know it from actual suffering. I think that is an admission of the fact that these people are in the habit of attending conventions and public gatherings. Of course I do not mean to say that the Department intends that they shall go in and override the other people, but I do mean that they are sent there for the purpose of impressing on the people the beauty of this system and its usefulness.

Mr. President, I wanted to say something further, but the hour is so late that I am disposed to quit.

Mr. OVERMAN. Before the Senator sits down, speaking about propaganda——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I sent out and got this statement, which is very interesting to me. I find these items:

> Educational addresses, etc.

Mr. OVERMAN. Page 299—

> Educational addresses, etc.
> Salaries, $1,508.74.

Does that mean that they have spent that money in employing somebody to make speeches to create sentiment?

Mr. TELLER. I do not know what it means.

Mr. OVERMAN. The next item is:

> Travel and other expenses, $1,169.97.

And just above that there are items for "preparation of articles," and so on, amounting to $47,483.63, including editorial review, distribution, proof reading, and so forth, printing, bulletins, circulars, and so forth.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from North Carolina will observe that of that amount, $41,516.96 was for "printing, bulletins, circulars, etc." It is the custom of the Department of Agriculture to print bulletins in large numbers, as the Senator knows.

Mr. TELLER. These are not agricultural documents. These are forestry documents.

Mr. OVERMAN. The principal point I want to call attention to is as to whether they have a right to employ men to make speeches and create sentiment by educational addresses.

Mr. WARREN. From the item as it appears, we have no evidence whether it is for speeches or not, but if the Senator will go through the list of salaries and expenses of the persons employed perhaps he can discover that. I am unable to say at a casual glance for what it is expended. It does not state.

Mr. OVERMAN. It says for "educational addresses."

Mr. WARREN. As to the printing of bulletins, of course the Senator will not say that that is confined to forestry or to any bureau of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. TELLER. I know that, but they are not teaching agriculture. They are teaching the forest-reserve system.

Mr. WARREN. They are teaching the forest-reserve system and those things relating thereto; and I say the Department publishes bulletins from the other bureaus the same as from this.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, when the convention was held in Denver I do not think I will exaggerate if I say there was a cord of stuff printed and piled up there to be distributed gratuitously.

Mr. WARREN. If I may be allowed, I want to say further that if $1,508.74 is the total amount that has been spent for salaries to educate the people it is hardly worth mention, I think.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Colorado said the Department began with $15,000 and had gotten up to $3,500,000. If we begin hiring people to make speeches, where will it end?

Mr. WARREN. Of the $3,500,000, $1,508.72 does not look very formidable for education.

Mr. TELLER. It reads like this: "Educational addresses, etc.: Salaries, $1,508.74; travel and other expenses, $1,169.97." There is $2,678.71 that this does not include; the class of men I have mentioned who are on the pay roll who are doing this thing.

Mr. WARREN. This distinctly means, as I understand the Senator from Colorado, that he is of the opinion that certain employees charged up to the Forestry Service have been engaged in other business.

Mr. TELLER. I have not any question about it, Mr. President.

Mr. FULTON. May I ask the Senator from Wyoming a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I should like to ask the acting chairman of the committee, who has this bill in charge, if, in his judgment, there is any authority whatever in law for this Bureau to employ people to educate public sentiment to what they think it should be or to deliver addresses? Does the Senator think there is any authority whatever in law for that?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator begs the question a little when he assumes that they are to educate the people up to some given theory. That, I presume, is the Senator's assumption.

Mr. FULTON. We will strike out the theory and just say the Bureau.

Mr. WARREN. As to that I will say that in these appropriations, particularly in the Agricultural Department, the entire scheme of most of the Bureaus—take, for instance, Irrigation and Drainage—is directed to educating the people as to how they may raise this crop or how they may develop that piece of land, and so forth, and so forth. In other words, to educate the people is the purpose of the Agricultural Department, and we have continuously appropriated money therefor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Colorado refused to yield to me, but if I may be allowed——

Mr. FULTON. I am not through.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted simply to answer the question.

Mr. FULTON. Just a second. I am asking the Senator from Wyoming a question. I ask him, however, if he does not understand that this applies to the Forestry Service? I am talking about the Forestry Service.

Mr. WARREN. There is no reason why they should differentiate between the Forestry Service and the others.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, perhaps reading what the Chief Forester says might throw some light on it.

Mr. FULTON. I would be glad to hear it, because I should like to know.

Mr. TELLER. This was before the Senate committee.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator, if I remember, the Chief Forester did not appear before the Senate committee.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know whether he did or not, though it is likely that he should have done so.

Mr. WARREN. I am reminded by the Clerk that he did appear. I now remember distinctly that he did.

Mr. MONEY. The Chief Forester did appear before the committee and made extended remarks.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And his colloquy was with the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MONEY. Just read it.

Mr. TELLER. I will read it:

Secretary WILSON. They do not have their office of publications.

Senator MONEY. It is publication when you prepare material and send it off to somebody who publishes it. You do not print it in your office.

Mr. PINCHOT. May I explain how it came about? We found that our scientists had a great deal of information—

Everybody is a scientist now—

We found that our scientists had a great deal of information they did not want to give out, which is natural, because a man getting information in that way very seldom sees the necessity for the immediate publication of it. He wants to write a complete bulletin, a long treatise, that will be satisfactory to him from a scientific point of view, and which will not give popular information. We found that we could not get into the hands of the people a whole lot of valuable information that was being gathered at Government expense unless we had somebody in the Forest Service whose business it was to go to the different chiefs and scientific men and pick up what they had, and then write it out so that the newspaper men could get it.

Now, that they are certainly doing by employees.

Out of that grew the custom of giving out the material in this way. As a result we get each month a distribution of our material which would be utterly impossible in any other way. We got track last month of about 23,000,000 copies of newspapers containing some information about forestry. Of course it would be absolutely impossible to make any publication through bulletins that would reach the public in that way. We were driven to it because we found that the bulletin method did not get out the facts that ought to be known about forestry widely enough among our own people.

That is the reason I suppose the Senator from New York gave it to us to-day, a fact that I have disputed, and if I had not left my memorandum——

Mr. FULTON. Then this is largely newspaper work, is it not?

Mr. TELLER. It is newspaper work.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. In discussing this subject a few days since I read the affidavit of Edward T. Barber in regard to the forester who attended the meeting held at Denver, to which the Senator has referred. It was his affidavit in which it was said that this forester was instructed to charge his expenses to the hay and grain account. I went home from the Senate after making the remarks on that day and found in my mail a copy of the Shoshone Journal of May 5, which was the current number, and in it this editorial relating to that subject, if the Senator from Colorado will permit me.

Mr. TELLER. Read it.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is an editorial in the Shoshone Journal, published at Shoshone, Idaho, May 5, 1908, and it reads as follows:

"Hay" delegates from Forest Service—

That is the heading of the editorial—

The Senate has adopted the resolution of Senator Heyburn calling on the Secretary of Agriculture for the names of employees of the Forestry Service who have attended forestry conventions, and whether their expenses have been paid by the Government on such trips. The resolution is all right, but it does not go far enough. In fact, it will miss the most essential point which should be brought out in such an investigation. The resolution should call for a report of the names of the employees of the Forestry Service who have attended at Government expense any public meeting or convention, whether a forestry convention or not. The Journal knows of at least one employee of the Forestry Service in Idaho who was ordered to go to Salt Lake in January, 1907, to look after the interests of the Forest Service at the meeting of the National Wool Growers' convention and to charge his expenses on that trip to the "hay and grain" account.

At all meetings during the past three years of either the State or National Wool Growers, or cattle growers, or irrigation meetings—in fact, any sort of public meeting where the methods of the Forest Service were likely to become a subject of discussion—such meetings have been packed by forest employees, many of whom were working for small wages, which made it impossible for them to attend such meetings unless their expenses were paid. Doubtless the Government has paid for thousands of tons of hay and grain to meet such accounts.

That is an editorial written by the party who made the affidavit, who is one of the owners and editors of this responsible journal.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Utah for a question. I do not want the Senator to go into an extensive argument, because I want to conclude.

Mr. SMOOT. I just want to answer. I can not say how responsible the journal is, I do not care who Mr. Barber is, the affidavit that Mr. Barber made is not true, nor is that editorial true.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator from Colorado will permit me a word, I will say the Senator from Utah made some such statement in reply to the affidavit which I read on a former occasion, and the newspapers said that he said my statement was not true. I presume that it came to the Senator's attention. I made no personal statement about it. I think the Senator would not undertake to challenge a statement of mine in those terms. I merely give the affidavit for what it is worth.

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose the Senator has noticed the RECORD. I simply said the statement of the affidavit was not true, and I say so yet. I did not charge the Senator from Idaho with making the statement upon his own information or knowledge, but I said the affidavit was not true, and I say so now, and to-morrow I shall see that the Senate is advised of the untruthfulness of the statement.

Mr. TELLER. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator wants to challenge anything I have said, he can do so. What I have said I will make good here or anywhere. I simply say to the Senator that I have said nothing but what can be proven, and I could have kept the Senate hours in detailing the same kind of thing that I have heard from people complaining. and I do not believe that the Senator will undertake to dispute my statement. If he does, he can do so. I know, Mr. President, the Department will dispute it. They have disputed everything that has been said against their misconduct.

Mr. WARREN. I take it the Senator will allow that there are misunderstandings, and possibly misstatements and mistakes. I assume the Senator does not charge the Department of Agriculture with indulging in and employing methods through which they make false statements.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I will tell you what they do. If you make a statement, they submit it to their forest ranger; he denies it; and then they deny it. That is the way it is done. I suppose that is the usual method in the Departments.

Mr. President, I have some papers sent here with the request that I should put them into the RECORD; but they were so violent in their denunciations that I sent them back and stated that I could not afford to put in papers of that kind. The temper of a great many people in my section of the country is at a high point, and I do not blame them for it. Mr. President, I have myself some temper about it, and I am glad I do not live where one of those dirty forest rangers could come around and give his commands to me. I think if he should do so there would be trouble between him and me, even if I am old. I have never seen the time that I would take orders the way they make our citizens take them. I am sorry that the citizens take them and that they do not assert their rights and settle the matter as American citizens usually settle such matters without going to law.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me a moment before he sits down?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. I think it is nothing but just to Mr. Pinchot, the Chief Forester, to say, in reference to the expenditure of this money for educational purposes, that his force prepared the articles that he thought of great interest and value to the people; that they were published in a great many newspapers which had a vast number of readers; and that he never paid a cent to any newspaper or magazine for the publication and dissemination of this information. It was prepared in the course of their work by the people whom he had under him. Some of them prepared bulletins; but these were short and condensed statements that he considered of great value to the people, which were hardly appropriate in an enlarged bulletin, and the newspaper people came in and got them, and he never had to pay a cent for the publication of any of them. I say that much in the Senator's time and by his indulgence, just simply in justice to Mr. Pinchot.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have not charged that they paid any newspaper. I did say that I believe those people were put on the pay rolls because they could be useful in writing articles; and I have not been able to find out any other reason why they are on the pay roll except that. If the people need education, if they want to know what a deplorable condition the forests are in and what a savior this man is, of course we ought not to stand on a mere bagatelle of forty or fifty thousand dollars for publications. We ought certainly to give him a chance to get himself before the public.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. In view of what the Senator has said and the comments of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], I wish to state that the Forester, when before the committee, was asked as to this matter, and he made the statement which has already been made, that he paid no newspapers or magazines for any publishments. He was asked then as to who prepared these articles, who edited them, and why they did so; and his answer was that the Bureau was continually being asked for information and for articles and that they found it cheaper to detail a clerk or two to prepare such articles, so that they might be used in bulletins in the one case, or in newspapers in the other; that it took less time and cost less money to do it in that way than to submit to interviews and in an oral way discuss these matters with all the various newspapers, which, of course, were bound to have in frequent attendance their reporters and representatives.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to do any injustice to Mr. Pinchot. I have stated that these appeals to us from different sections of the country from people of character and standing originated with the Department. I think the discussion shows and that the admissions made and the evidence here show that that is the fact and I am willing to leave it there. He pays for the preparation of these articles, of course. He says it did not cost much, only between five and six thousand dollars a year; but, Mr. President, that is nothing compared to what he wants. He wants a million dollars; and if the committee had been pliant enough he would have got it. He has got $500,000 in this bill absolutely at his disposal, which he can use in any way he sees fit, provided he thinks it is in the interest of the forest reserves. We knocked out that part of it which provided that he might buy other lands. Of course I heard an appeal that some poor settler had gotten inside of a forest reserve. If he got there at all, he got there before the forest was made. He has not got there since, that I know of, although the Senator says there are a thousand of them. He can tell us when he makes a speech where they are. I suppose he is the mouthpiece of the Department in that particular, and that he will tell us. I do not know. Complaints come to me from every part of the State that forest reserves are closed; that upon every entrance into a forest reserve you will find a notice: "Keep out of this; this is Government property."

I think I have kept the Senate long enough. There are many things I intended to say, but I am going to say one or two things before I conclude.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado what he proposes? Has he offered any amendment?

Mr. TELLER. I want to knock that provision out.

Mr. FORAKER. Which provision?

Mr. TELLER. The one for $500,000.

Mr. FORAKER. Is that all?

Mr. TELLER. That is the main thing I should like to knock out. There are many other things that I should like to knock out, but I do not suppose I can do so. I am pretty practical; I know pretty well what the influence of the Department is. I have felt it, and I do not suppose we can get it out. We will try, anyway.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think I ought to say——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. In view of what the Senator from Colorado has said, I wish to state that at the proper time his attention will be called to the estimates for this $500,000, and, indeed, for considerably more. I think it is subdivided as much as the Senator would expect it to be. As to whether it shall come in or go out, and how much we may appropriate, that is quite another thing; but I do not, in justice, wish to have the objection rest upon the ground that there is no estimate in detail.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose that this is a matter for the Senate to decide.

Mr. FORAKER. The reason I asked whether that was so, was that I was very much interested in the statement made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] in the course of his remarks, to the effect that to the extent of more than a million dollars—something, I think, in excess of $1,100,000—Mr. Pinchot, who, I suppose, is the official referred to, was allowed to fix salaries and that practically that much money was at his disposal in that respect.

Mr. TELLER. There are a few salaries which Congress has fixed, but the great majority of them are fixed by Mr. Pinchot, or by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not suppose that was allowed. I suppose Congress has authorized it by some blanket provision.

Mr. TELLER. The committee thought last year, when they required a detailed statement, that we would not be required to put in a lump sum.

I want to say a word or two about coal, although it is pretty late.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TELLER. I am not through.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he was through.

Mr. TELLER. Not quite; though I know I ought to be.

Mr. LODGE. I did not mean to suggest that in the least; but I myself intended to say something in connection with the matter.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] says that in a few years we shall have used up all the coal. It has been repeated through the forest reserve circulars again and again that all the lumber is going to be consumed. These people have never made a statement as to how much coal there is in the United States, and there is not a man living who knows; but you might guess somewhat at it. I tell you that lying on our border there are at least 30,000 square miles of coal land in the State of Wyoming. There is probably a good deal more than that, and there is as much in the State of Colorado, and probably a great deal more. There are, I suppose, 60,000 square miles of coal there. Wyoming has more coal twice over than Pennsylvania; Colorado has twice as much coal as has Pennsylvania. Utah has some; I do not know how much. I think she has some, because her citizens have been charged lately with stealing it, I remember; so I suppose there must be some coal there.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator from Colorado will generously include Colorado in the matter of alleged stealing.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, some of our best citizens have been charged with stealing coal, and I shall illustrate how they steal it. Up to 1873 there had been no such thing as segregation of coal land from agricultural land. Then there was a segregation made; that is to say, the orders went out from the Department after the statute was passed to separate the different kinds of land, so that when the returns of the surveyors were made it would appear that "this is coal land" and "this is agricultural land." They made the report in that way, and no man could take an acre of coal unless it was returned as coal land. Then he paid $10 an acre for it under one condition and $20 under another. All the rest of the land was returned as agricultural, and was susceptible of homesteading and filing lieu scrip upon it, and all that.

A prominent gentleman in Colorado—I will not use his name, because he has been very much hurt over the thing—a very prominent gentleman and one of high character, with knowledge that some land in the vicinity where he lived returned as agricultural land was undoubtedly coal land, although there is not a man living to-day who knows there is coal there, bought some lieu scrip—something which grew out of this forest business; we never had any before, and we would not have had any if it had not been for the forest reserves—and laid it on this land. Thereupon the grand jury indicted him for a conspiracy to get agricultural land as coal land; that is, to get it for the coal in it. As a lawyer, I need not say that, it being open to occupation as agricultural land, a man could take it as such even though it contained deposits of coal. I believe that case is pending. About 18 or 19 of our citizens were indicted for violating the regulations of the forest reserve and the Department—not the land laws, but regulations, mind you, not made by Congress, but made by the Department. When the case came before the United States judge, who was a man of high character and an excellent gentleman, he said on demurrer: "On the face of your papers you show that no offense is committed. The Department can not make regulations and create a criminal offense. The Supreme Court has said that." Thereupon there was a great outcry. Whether true or not, it was said that the President certainly would do all he could to reverse that decision. I do not know what he had to do with it;

I do not know whether he actually said so; but the newspapers said that. A week or two afterwards the Supreme Court of the United States decided an Oregon case upon that same question, and decided it just as Judge Lewis had decided it in Colorado. I think that some time that matter will probably be understood, and it will be very astonishing to some people. I know the Department, and especially the Bureau of Forestry, think if they can not, under their regulations, make a criminal case against a man they will fall; that the ground will be stricken from under their feet, and that the system will go to the bad undoubtedly.

But that is elementary. Congress can not tell a man that he may make a regulation the violation of which is a criminal act. Congress may provide by law that he may make a regulation to carry out the law, but he can not make a regulation by which he may change the act. So I do not feel any humiliation about the lands that our people have been indicted for stealing, under those circumstances and with this explanation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to call attention to the Book of Estimates on this subject, commencing on page 131 and continuing to and including part of page 136. I find that there is no statement as to the items for which an expenditure of $1,167,676 is required or estimated for, except the general title, "General expenses in the Forest Service," found on page 132. There are only three items.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as the Senator knows, the Book of Estimates comes out early and is usually followed with supplemental estimates. There are supplemental estimates respecting the Agriculture Department and the requirements of the Forest Service.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it not true, I would ask the Senator from Wyoming, in charge of the bill, that the lump fund requested by those supplemental estimates is $1,500,000?

Mr. WARREN. There is a supplemental estimate or requirement and request for $2,000,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. A lump sum?

Mr. WARREN. Well, when you say lump sum, that is the amount submitted; that is the total estimate. As to what shall be done with all of it——

Mr. HEYBURN. With all of it?

Mr. WARREN. It is, in my judgment, very complete. It is too bulky for me to offer it or to read it at this time, but the Senator can inspect it. In fact it is in the hearings before the House committee. It covers several pages.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it not true that they ask for a lump sum to be expended by the Department under the discretion of the Department, without enumerating the purposes for which it is to be expended?

Mr. WARREN. I do not find it that way. The estimates are all itemized. The bill contains a half million dollars, inserted in exactly the manner it was inserted a year ago, but I find in looking through the estimates that they enumerate all of the uses to which it is to be devoted.

Mr. HEYBURN. But is it not true that they provide in such general terms as "for administration, Forest Service?"

Mr. WARREN. They take up each forestry item by itself and go into the particulars. For instance, here is an item for cabins, $90; barn, $79. We will go to another: "Three cabins, $550; three barns, 7 miles of fence," and so forth.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not refer to those items. I refer, rather, to what they call the "general administration," which they say is for the purpose of building telegraph and telephone lines, roads, and that class of expenditures.

Mr. WARREN. Had the Senator waited a moment I would have come to that, because in the same place I find an item for repairing 12 miles of road, 30 miles of trail, and so forth. The Department covers all those items.

Mr. HEYBURN. For the coming year?

Mr. WARREN. For the coming year.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is there no lump sum in the request of the Forestry Service?

Mr. WARREN. I know of no request for a lump sum as such.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator from Idaho allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to ask my colleague whether or not it is a fact that the various items which he is enumerating there are included in the $3,296,200 which the bill carries?

Mr. WARREN. No; they are not as to the particular items I read. This was submitted in the place of the $500,000 now contained in the bill. They asked for $2,000,000 instead of $500,000; and they distributed it as to the entire amount in the manner in which I have indicated by quoting a few lines. As to telephone lines and all that, it is here in this book.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will my colleague allow me just one moment more? I notice a total of $3,296,200 for salaries paid for the Forest Service on page 25, outside of the $500,000.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator refer to the bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; page 25 of the bill. I am asking for information, and nothing else. In lines 13, 14, and 15 there is provided for salaries and general expenses of the Forest Service a total of $3,296,200. There must be somewhere, in the possession of the chairman or of somebody else, an estimate that does not appear in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. WARREN. Very true. I have stated that it came up in the supplemental estimates, and I was reading from the supplemental estimates.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understood the Senator to say that those supplemental estimates were not included in this item of $3,000,000, but were in the $500,000 item.

Mr. WARREN. Well, the first estimate in the Book of Estimates and all the later ones account for that general sum. All of the $2,000,000, of which the $500,000 is a part, is accounted for in the book from which I was reading.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; but what I am suggesting is that those previous estimates do not amount to this sum within $100,000. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. WARREN. There is a special estimate for that, separately sent up by the Department, or through the Treasury Department.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I can throw some light on this matter. On the face of the bill it will be seen, by adding together the amount to be provided in lines 13, 14, and 15, page 25, and the amounts to be appropriated in the suceeding six lines, that $500,000 is the lump sum, and this makes up a difference between the specific appropriation and the grand total. I would call attention to the language to show that it is not estimated for in detail. It says, commencing in line 16, page 25:

> And there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000, to be expended as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct for the proper and economical administration, protection, and development of the National Forests.

That leaves that $500,000 to be expended as he may see fit.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to ask my colleague another question.

Mr. WARREN. Just a moment. There is no question about that; but the statement made that there was no estimate for it is not correct.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not in the Book of Estimates,

Mr. WARREN. Very well. As I explained a moment ago, in my service in this body, which has not been very short, I have never known a time when any one of the great supply bills has been treated in committee upon the Book of Estimates alone. We have had to depend not only upon that, but upon supplemental estimates. We have tried to obtain from the Departments a conformance to our wish that they should not submit supplemental estimates, and that they should endeavor to submit the estimates early enough and fully enough to prevent that; but, nevertheless, they come to us on every one of these supply bills with supplemental estimates.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Now, will my colleague permit a question?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has the floor.

Mr. TELLER. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will ask if there is any way or any source through which members of the Senate can get these estimates? I have been hunting all day for a copy of the hearings to which the Senator has three or four times called our attention, but can not find it anywhere. The copies are either entirely exhausted or have disappeared.

Mr. WARREN. So far as that is concerned, we are not responsible, of course, at this end of the Capitol for documents of the other House; but here is a copy which I shall be pleased to hand to my colleague.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What I want to get is some way by which we can ascertain these estimates and what the expenditures are, for we seem to be at sixes and sevens and at cross-purposes in regard to them.

Mr. WARREN. True.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have not seen it in anything that has been submitted except in the Book of Estimates, and we are told that the Book of Estimates is not conclusive, and "cuts no ice." What I want to get at is something that will give us the information we are trying to get.

Mr. WARREN. It is true that the Book of Estimates is not conclusive, but I should not like to be quoted as saying that it "cuts no ice."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I withdraw the expression.

Mr. WARREN. But here are the supplemental estimates, I may say, in the House hearings.

Mr. HEYBURN. How are Senators to criticise or consider the wisdom of the items in these estimates that are contained in a volume not freely accessible to every Senator?

Mr. LODGE. They are perfectly accessible.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Massachusetts is mistaken. I have been trying to get a copy all day and can not find one, either at this end of the Capitol or the other.

Mr. WARREN. If they are not accessible, I do not know that. It is a regularly printed document on the House side.

Now, as to informing Senators, with all respect to my colleagues, I want to remind them that "you can lead a horse to water, but you can not make him drink." You can not force this Senate as a body or individual Senators to wade through a pamphlet of thousands of pages of testimony, of estimates, and so forth, and of course when the bill reaches the Senate its provisions are naturally new to some Senators. I do not think that for that reason they are debarred from obtaining the information. The fault, perhaps, may be somewhat with the Senators themselves.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator from Wyoming allow me to ask him a question right here for information?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator from Wyoming has read from the Book of Estimates, and he says the $500,000 is intended to cover, among other things, buildings, barns, and so forth. I find on page 23 where there is a part of the enumeration of the items for the $3,150,000, "to erect necessary buildings." There is a broad statement—"to erect necessary buildings" for the Forestry Reserve Service. Are there other buildings to be erected besides those covered by the words "necessary buildings?"

Mr. TELLER. I believe this question will have to be postponed until to-morrow morning.

Mr. WARREN. I will not answer if the Senator from Colorado refuses to yield. I was simply going to say that possibly I had not explained it sufficiently. The estimates in the first place are printed in the Book of Estimates. They go to the committee on the other side. They are then furnished with additional estimates, and the additional estimates, which cover this $500,000 which we have allowed, include $2,000,000 and also include the additions that they wanted to all the other appropriations, and in reading there as I did I read simply a part of the $2,000,000. Now, we have cut that down to $500,000, or, rather, the House did.

Mr. TELLER. It will be recollected that I did not bring in this estimate question. It was brought in by others. It is quite immaterial to me whether there is an estimate or not. If there is an estimate, I am still opposed to the provision. The estimate does not change my opposition to it. I did not consider it a question worthy of taking up the time of the Senate with. I have been diverted by the colloquy of my colleagues here, and I think they have made more of a speech than I have, at least some of them have. I can not very well conclude to-night. There are some things I wish to take up in the morning.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TELLER. I will yield the floor with the understanding that I may resume in the morning.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. President, I have listened with interest this afternoon to a great deal of indignant eloquence about the wrongs of lump sums and sums left in the control of officers of the Departments to spend as they please. I felt the liberties of my country shaking under my feet. But I have been surprised to see, looking quite casually at this book, examining the Forestry Service, that in the Bureau of Entomology the statutory salaries are $19,443, and the lump-fund salaries, spent at the discretion and pleasure of the head of the Bureau, are $164,644; Bureau of Soils, statutory salaries $35,384, lump fund $83,178; Chemistry, statutory salaries $27,103, lump fund $121,947; Plant Industry, statutory salaries $160,987, lump fund $429,168; Weather Bureau, statutory salaries $193,918, lump fund $591,042, spent by Mr. Moore; Animal Industry, statutory salaries $76,642, lump fund, spent by the Department at its pleasure, $2,400,669.

Mr. President, I am not concerned to defend lump funds, but it does seem to me that to discharge all these vials of wrath on one bureau in the Department, when every other bureau has a lump fund, which is spent in the same way, and the Animal Industry Bureau has one twice as large——

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I alluded in brief to that point earlier in the day, but not in so complete a way as the Senator has done. The Department of Agriculture has always provided in this way and these bureaus with lump sums. If the Senator will go a little further, he will find in all the regular appropriation supply bills great lump sums.

Mr. LODGE. I know it.

Mr. WARREN. I do not approve of it, but they are there just the same.

Mr. LODGE. I am aware of it. But I am not arguing the question, I will say, whether the lump appropriations——

Mr. WARREN. Of course that goes to strengthen what the Senator says.

Mr. LODGE. I am not arguing the question whether lump appropriations are wise or not. I simply make the point that this is not a sin of one bureau or a thing given to one bureau alone, and that every other bureau officer in the Department of Agriculture is doing precisely the same thing.

Mr. HALE. I do not know but that the Senator in charge of the bill has already stated it; it may appear in some report of his, but what are the appropriations in this bill for this Bureau for the next fiscal year compared with the appropriations for the present fiscal year? Can the Senator tell me?

Mr. WARREN. The proposed expenditures for the next fiscal year under the bill as it stands will be $223,277.64 more than will have been expended during the present fiscal year.

Mr. HALE. What is the aggregate amount?

Mr. WARREN. The aggregate amount is $3,796,200.

Mr. HALE. Or, for all purposes, about two hundred and odd thousand dollars in excess of the present year?

Mr. WARREN. For all purposes $223,000, in round figures, more than for this fiscal year. However, that is not discovered by a comparison of this appropriation bill with the preceding bill until you look at the provision in the last agricultural appropriation bill, which provides that after the 1st of July, 1907, moneys taken in from forestry should go into the Treasury. That left unexpended on July 1 something over eleven hundred thousand dollars, which was available during the year, and that sum and the appropriation of the present fiscal year, together, make the appropriation for the next fiscal year about $223,000 less than for the coming year as provided for in this bill.

Mr. CULLOM obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield to me that I may give a notice?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that I shall call up the bill immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business to-morrow, and shall endeavor to press it, to the exclusion of other business.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 8, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate, May 7, 1908.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY.

James J. Crossley, of Iowa, to be United States attorney for the third division of the district of Alaska, vice Nathan V. Harlan, resigned.

APPOINTMENT IN THE NAVY.

Harry H. Lane, a citizen of New York, to be an assistant surgeon in the Navy from the 5th day of May, 1908, to fill a vacancy existing in that grade on that date.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate May 7, 1908.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

William R. Wheeler, of California, to be Assistant Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

PROMOTION IN THE NAVY.

Pay Inspector Thomas J. Cowie to be pay director in the Navy from the 2d day of May, 1908.

POSTMASTERS.

ALASKA.

Lillie N. Gordon to be postmaster at Seward, Alaska.

GEORGIA.

Harry S. Edwards to be postmaster at Macon, Bibb County, Ga.

John F. Jenkins to be postmaster at Ashburn, Turner County, Ga.

Levi L. Spence to be postmaster at Ball Ground, Cherokee County, Ga.

Albert N. Tumlin to be postmaster at Cave Springs, Floyd County, Ga.

NEVADA.

V. L. Adams to be postmaster at Wonder, Churchill County, Nev.

OKLAHOMA.

J. S. Thompson to be postmaster at Wellston, Lincoln County, Okla.

PENNSYLVANIA.

John S. Edmundson to be postmaster at Duquesne, in the county of Allegheny and State of Pennsylvania.

Charles E. Foringer to be postmaster at Kaylor, Armstrong County, Pa.

John H. McDermott to be postmaster at McKees Rocks, in the county of Allegheny and State of Pennsylvania.

Charles Wolfenden to be postmaster at Sheridanville, in the county of Allegheny and State of Pennsylvania.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 7, 1908.

[Continuation of the legislative day of Monday, May 4, 1908.]

The recess having expired, the House, at 11 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m., was called to order by the Speaker.

STORM SUFFERERS IN TEXAS AND TENNESSEE.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 179) amending the joint resolution for the relief of storm sufferers in Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, and Louisiana, approved April 30, 1908.

Resolved, etc., That the provisions and benefits of public resolution No. 17, for the relief of storm sufferers in Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, and Louisiana, approved April 30, 1908, be extended to the sufferers from the same storm or cyclone in Texas and Tennessee, and that the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant the same relief to persons in Texas and Tennessee whose property was injured or destroyed as provided in the original resolution for citizens of Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, and Louisiana.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee to allow me to make a request for unanimous consent to amend the resolution so as to include Arkansas. I have seen dispatches from there to the effect that certain parts of that State have been afflicted in the same way; and if they have not, it can not do any hurt.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I have no objection to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution amended according to the suggestion of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I did not quite understand the suggestion.

The SPEAKER. It is to include Arkansas in the resolution. The Chair hears no objection.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MOON of Tennessee a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was, on his motion, laid on the table.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-three Members present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members; as many as favor the motion will, when their names are called, answer "yea," and as many as opposed will answer "nay;" those present and not voting will answer "present," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 267, nays 2, answered "present" 13, not voting 105, as follows:

For the session:

Mr. COUSINS with Mr. FLOOD.

Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. RIORDAN.

Mr. BUTLER with Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia.

Mr. BRADLEY with Mr. GOULDEN.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The doors were opened.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21260, the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Mr. WATSON in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of bailiffs and criers, not exceeding three bailiffs and one crier in each court, except in the southern district of New York: Provided, That all persons employed under section 715 of the Revised Statutes shall be deemed to be in actual attendance when they attend upon the order of the courts: Provided further, That no such person shall be employed during vacation; of reasonable expenses actually incurred for travel and attendance of district judges directed to hold court outside of their districts, not to exceed $10 per day each, to be paid on written certificates of the judges, and such payments shall be allowed the marshal in the settlement of his accounts with the United States; of reasonable expenses actually incurred for travel and attendance of justices or judges who shall attend the circuit court of appeals held at any other place than where they reside, not to exceed $10 per day, the same to be paid upon written certificates of said judge, and such payments shall be allowed the marshal in the settlement of his account with the United States; of meals and lodgings for jurors in United States cases, and of bailiffs in attendance upon the same, when ordered by the court; and of compensation for jury commissioners, $5 per day, not exceeding three days for any one term of court, $260,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 148, line 14, after the words "New York," insert: "And the northern district of Illinois."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

From and after the passage of this act the Reform School of the District of Columbia shall be know and designated as the "National Training School for Boys."

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 19, on page 157, insert:

"For safe or vault for safe-keeping records in the office United States commissioner for Teller, Alaska, $500."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman will reserve the point of order for a few minutes, as I would like to say a few words.

Mr. TAWNEY. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment just read, appropriating $500 for a safe or vault for the United States commissioner and recorder of the Port Clarence mining district at Teller, Alaska, is offered by me at the request of many people in that section of Alaska, and has the approval of the commissioner of the district, Judge S. G. Hinton. I have here a telegram from Judge Hinton, which reads as follows:

TELLER, VIA NOME, ALASKA, January 8, 1908.

Hon. WM. SULZER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Important procure appropriation $500 for vault this office, safe-keeping of records. Ask FAIRBANKS, CALE, JONES, ANKENY, PILES help in my name.

S. G. HINTON,
United States Commissioner and Recorder,
Port Clarence Recording District.

The telegram speaks for itself, and should be controlling in this matter with the Members of this House. It is absolutely necessary for the United States Commissioner at Teller, Alaska, to have a large safe, or a suitable fireproof vault built, for the safe preservation of the important records and record books now in his office. In case of fire, these invaluable records would all be destroyed, and the loss would be irreparable. It would cause endless trouble.

Mr. Chairman, last summer I was in that part of Alaska and I saw for myself. I know from personal observation how important this matter is to the people up there. The Port Clarence mining district in Alaska embraces a territory of nearly 30,000 square miles. It covers one of the greatest mineral sections in the world. The recorder's office and the commissioner's office are located at Teller—a small place with a few dozen wooden houses all close together. Hundreds and thousands of valuable mining claims have been recorded in this recording office. Many transfers have been made. Innumerable deeds have been executed. All these have been recorded in something like thirty or forty volumes of records which are most important to thousands of people and ought to be carefully preserved. The office of the commissioner at present is in a little wooden building. In case of fire, likely to occur at any time, these records would be all destroyed. There would be absolutely no way of saving them. There is no fire department there. Teller is a very small village. I believe the Delegate from Alaska, who is not present this morning, has requested and urged this appropriation before the Committee on Appropriations, and was referred to the Department of Justice.

The Department of Justice, as I understand it, is in favor of the appropriation being made. In case these records were destroyed, the title to all these mining properties on Seward Peninsula would become involved and lead to endless litigation. No man would then know who owned the property, or its record, or be able to follow the title and find out if it was free and clear. This $500 will either buy a suitable safe in which these records can be kept and preserved or it will build a fireproof vault in which they can be put. This is a most important matter, and the appropriation should be made. I hope the point of order, which I know lies against the amendment, will not be insisted on. If there is anything to-day the people up there want, it is this appropriation for the preservation of these records.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. When was the telegram received of which the gentleman spoke?

Mr. SULZER. This telegram was sent last January.

Mr. TAWNEY. Has the gentleman ever brought the matter to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. SULZER. Yes. The Delegate from Alaska brought it to the attention of the committee and was referred to the Department of Justice. The Department said that it had no money for this safe and commended Mr. CALE to Congress.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, I have no knowledge of the telegram or of the gentleman from New York bringing it to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations or any member of it.

Mr. SULZER. I talked to the gentleman about it.

Mr. TAWNEY. What member of the committee?

Mr. SULZER. I spoke to you about it.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman spoke to me about the Slocum disaster over in New York——

Mr. SULZER. And I spoke to you about this. It is a very important matter, and this appropriation ought to be made. In case these records are destroyed by fire it would be most disastrous to thousands and thousands of people who own mining properties on Seward Peninsula. I trust, therefore, that the point of order will be withdrawn and that the appropriation will be made.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the Department of Justice is supposed to be thoroughly aware of all the needs of these officers in Alaska and did not make an estimate for this appropriation, and there is no law authorizing it, I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Well, we will have it put in the bill in the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

For the public printing, for the public binding, and for paper for the public printing, including the cost of printing the debates and proceedings of Congress in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and for lithographing, mapping, and engraving for both Houses of Congress, the Supreme Court of the United States, the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the Court of Claims, the Library of Congress, the Executive Office, and the Departments; for salaries, compensation, or wages of all necessary clerks and employees additional to the foregoing specific sums and notwithstanding any limitation on such employments contained in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1908; for rents, fuel, gas, electric current, gas and electric fixtures, and ice; for bicycles, horses, wagons, and harness, and the care, driving, and subsistence of the same, to be used only for official purposes, including the purchase, maintenance, and driving of horses and vehicles for official use of officers of the Government Printing Office when in writing ordered by the Public Printer; for freight, expressage, telegraph and telephone service; for furniture, typewriters, and carpets; for traveling expenses, stationery, postage, and advertising; for advertising for sale documents which have accumulated in the office of the superintendent of documents, not exceeding $12,000; for directories, technical books, and books of reference, not exceeding $500; for adding and numbering machines, time stamps, and other machines of similar character; for repairs to machinery, implements, and buildings; for other necessary contingent and miscellaneous items authorized by the Public Printer; and for all the necessary materials needed in the prosecution of the work, $5,300,000; and from the said sum hereby appropriated printing and binding shall be done by the Public Printer to the amounts following, respectively, namely:

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I think should be read at this place.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

After the word "dollars," line 10, page 163, insert:

"Provided, That no payment shall be made for any material, machines, or furniture where the order or contract of purchase was for property exceeding $1,000 in value, unless such order or contract was approved by the Joint Committee on Printing, if Congress was in session when such order was given or contract made, or by the Secretary of the Interior if Congress was not in session."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have, of course, no objection to the point of order being reserved, but I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will not insist upon it, and I would be very glad if the Chairman would give us a little more order to make this statement as to the conditions in the Printing Office, which I think are of interest and importance to the committee, a statement which I trust will lead the Members not to raise the point of order. Not that I concede the point of order lies against it, for I claim it is a limitation, but whether limitation or not it is so manifestly, as it seems to me, in the interest of the public service that I trust that gentlemen of the committee will cooperate with me in having this amendment adopted. The power of the Government Printer is not actually understood by many Members of this House. Here is an appropriation in lump by which $5,300,000 is put under the control of the Public Printer, and with the exception of the purchase of paper the Public Printer has the entire control of making contracts, of making purchases for any amount within that limitation, which bind the Congress. Now, that is very great power, and the results certainly have not been satisfactory. For instance a year and a half ago the Public Printer was authorized to purchase or make contract with what was called the "Audit System." If that contract had been submitted as this resolution proposes, to the Joint Committee on Printing, which has time for examination which the Committee on Appropriations does not have, certainly that contract would never have been approved. As it was, the Public Printer, being entirely without control and beyond control as to the amount of money for which he could bind the Government, first agreed to pay the "Audit System" at the rate of $40,000 a year. At the end of the first year he, of his own volition, increased that contract so he bound the Government to pay for the "audit system" at the rate of $80,000 a year.

And the Government paid on that contract, until by an examination by the Joint Committee on Printing the contract was canceled, the sum of $125,000. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is my belief, and I think it is the belief of the entire committee, that that $125,000 was wasted; that the Government got from it no permanent good; and it is certain that the corporation which was furnishing these goods under the contract, as it was running during the past year, cleared up above the wages they were obliged to pay for employees to put in their own work, at least $50,000 profit a year. Now, no one, least of all my friends on the Committee on Appropriations, approve of such a result, and yet it is a result that is liable to occur when any official is given unrestrained power to dispose of millions of money as he in his judgment may see fit.

Now, further, Mr. Chairman, I want to state another power that has been exercised, and to ask whether this committee thinks it wise that such power should remain unrestrained and uncontrolled? During the last few years, after very much delay, instruments have been purchased for the setting of type. The Public Printer has bought, in all, machines to the amount of $1,000,000. It is the opinion of Mr. Rossiter, who has investigated the situation at the Public Printing Office, that the amount for purchasing these machines by the present Public Printer and his predecessor exceeded somewhat $1,000,000. We know that there was in the newspapers a large question of controversy as to the giving of the contracts, whether the Mergenthaler Company or some other corporation should get it. Surely, Mr. Chairman, such a power as that should not be left in the hands of any official without control. Now, the law provides that, when it comes to the purchases of paper, which are of considerable amount, for the purposes of the Government printing, the contracts are let under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PERKINS. So, when it comes to the purchases of paper that are made by the Government Printing Office, they are advertised in newspapers, directed by the Joint Committee on Printing. At a fixed day those bids are opened and they are let by the Joint Committee on Printing, receiving such advice as we desire from the Public Printer. As a result, through all these years there has been no suggestion that the purchases of paper were not judiciously made, to the best advantage of the Government; and undoubtedly when the law was first passed if the great extension of the Printing Department had been contemplated, there would have been provision that not only the paper but the machinery of that Office should also be bought subject to the approval of the Joint Committee on Printing. But such is not now the law, and the amendment which I have offered puts the purchases of material and of machinery on precisely the same footing that the purchases of paper are upon now.

The report of Mr. Rossiter shows an illustration. Within the last six months there were purchased by the Public Printer, subject to no supervision of anyone, materials and furniture to the value of $500,000. Some of that was wisely purchased and some of it unwisely purchased; but is it wise and will the gentlemen of this committee say that it is wise, that such power, by which the Public Printer can in six months spend for machinery, and for furniture, and for carpeting, or whatever he sees fit, one-half million of dollars, should be entirely without control or supervision? He bound the Government for half a million, and he could have bound the Government for a million dollars if he had seen fit, and we would have been obliged to pay the bills. Now, the amendment that I offer is this, that the Public Printer shall be required—that is, the result of it is that no appropriation shall be allowed unless contracts exceeding $1,000 in value made for the purchases of machinery or of material shall be approved by the Joint Committee on Printing. In other words, these purchases are put on precisely the same footing as the purchases of paper for the Government Printing Office. If this law had been in force, Mr. Chairman, within the last eighteen months, first, the $125,000 paid for the audit system would never have been paid. Second—

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Surely. I would like to be interrupted.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the employment of the audit system was not under the general authority of this section, as the gentleman seems to believe, but that during those years Congress expressly provided in this section for the employment of this Audit System.

Mr. PERKINS. We know that there was provision made for it from time to time.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. What I want to get at is this: We all agree that there should be a more efficient check. I want to see whether the check proposed by the gentleman is sufficient and suitable. Now, as I understand it, the Joint Committee on Printing for nine months out of every two years consists practically of only the Senate Committee on Printing.

Mr. PERKINS. No.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. In a practical view, is that not true?

Mr. PERKINS. No; because for the last two years there has been made in the place of the joint committee a joint commission, created with a provision that three Members of the House who were elected to the new Congress, and who were on the Joint Committee on Printing of the last Congress, should act on this joint commission.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now, is that statutory?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, it is statutory; it is law. It is not a permanent statutory law, because we have not yet been able, though we trust we shall ere long, to have this matter properly regulated by statute.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. But the gentleman does not propose the continuance of this joint commission, a joint committee on which the House has no membership for nine months in every two years.

Mr. PERKINS. Practically the evil which the gentleman supposes does not occur. This is precisely the same as with reference to the purchase of paper. Under the law the joint committee makes the contract for paper.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. While that is true, is not paper a commodity the price of which is well known, and are not these contracts made annually?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; precisely.

Mr. TAWNEY. Your proposition would require the approval of contracts that are made daily?

Mr. PERKINS. No.

Mr. TAWNEY. And nine months in every two years the House has no representation on the Joint Committee on Printing?

Mr. PERKINS. I think the points made by the gentleman are not of practical value, and I will state why. The Joint Committee on Printing consists of the Committee on Printing of each House. Now, in reference to the contracts for paper, it would be perfectly possible to have the paper purchased as the machines are purchased, from time to time. The joint committee meets at the time when both the House and the Senate are in session.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PERKINS. I only ask time sufficient to explain my amendment. We find that, practically, the Public Printer makes to us and can make a requisition for all the paper he requires during an entire year for printing. Sometimes some special need may exist when Congress is not in session, but that is something that would require the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, and is easily provided for, for practically 99 per cent, not only of the paper, but of machinery, the needs of the Office, and furniture, it is practically possible for the Public Printer to present to the joint committee a statement of what he reasonably requires, and the Committee on Printing during the time that Congress is in session can supervise and approve the contracts for 99 per cent of what is to be required for the Printing Office during the period Congress is not in session; and for such other things as he may require for amounts over $1,000 it is left with the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior and under his control.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I quite agree with the gentleman's purpose, but I simply seek information. I want to know if the purchase of paper is in fact a formal matter that is disposed of by the committee?

Mr. PERKINS. It is not a formal matter. We advertise. We have bids and competition from a great many, and every member of the committee is dunned to death by fellows who want to get the contract. But they all find out that the contract goes to the man who makes the lowest bid and has given satisfactory service.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is the tabulation done by the Committee on Printing?

Mr. PERKINS. It is tabulated in our presence; of course the work of tabulation is done by the clerks of the committee. The members of the committee do not perform the work of tabulation, but everything is tabulated and submitted to the joint committee. When that is done, we go over the tabulations in each case, and if they are not satisfactory to the committee, as was the case in reference to several contracts last January, we did not accept the tabulation, because we thought some of them were made on a somewhat unfair basis; then the matter is examined carefully, and finally the contracts are made. Certainly the result in that branch of the service has been entirely satisfactory, and we were willing to do the same work in reference to stock and machinery, and we felt that this would save much money, and prevent any gross abuse, and we know that there is a possibility of abuse, and often the reality.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now, does the gentleman think that a committee of Congress is the best body to pass upon the details of just what machinery is necessary for a printing office?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman from Iowa allow me to ask him a question in return?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is not a committee of Congress better than nothing?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am asking for information now.

Mr. PERKINS. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Iowa that I not only think that a committee of Congress is better than nothing, but I think, taking the present joint committee, of which I am a humble member, that it is the very best thing you could have. Our committee are not as busy as the Committee on Appropriations. We have plenty of time to investigate this. We are interested in the subject. We are zealous, as I think any committee charged with a particular work should be; and, barring myslef, I think you could not find better agents for this work than the Joint Committee on Printing as it is at present organized, and as, in my belief, it will continue to be organized, or as we have reason to expect it will be organized in the future.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The selection of a particular kind of machinery, for instance, whether a monoline or a linotype machine, being a somewhat technical question, is not a matter over which Congress ordinarily would exercise control, is it?

Mr. PERKINS. In reply to that I will say that the Committee on Appropriations calls before it persons who can give it information in reference to such details. So we should call before us persons who would give us information, and we think after having been informed by competent persons, we would then be in a position to exercise our judgment, which we hope would be intelligent, and which we are sure would be disinterested, free from any bias or possible interest in contracts, and all the influences to which persons connected with the office are necessarily subjected.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. Is it not the gentleman's observation, as a member of the Committee on Printing, that machinery has been bought for the Government Printing Office during the past two or three years, to the amount, perhaps, of $100,000, displacing other machinery, which, perhaps, was not quite so up-to-date, but which was yet entirely effective, which machinery was thrown in the scrap heap, in that way imposing an entirely unnecessary burden of expense upon the Government?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; exactly so; and if the gentleman will allow me just a minute, I will read from the report of Mr. Rossiter, who, under the direction of the President, has made a most careful examination of the conditions in the Printing Office. In relation to the subject referred to by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT], he says in reference to this purchase of $1,000,000 of these linotype machines—

> An inspection of this great plant of composing machines leads to the conclusion that it has been installed with poor judgment, that an investment of not more than one-half that sum would have been ample for several years, to test the machines and determine their field of usefulness.

In other words, in the opinion of Mr. Rossiter, $1,000,000 has been spent in three or four years, where $500,000 could probably have been more profitably expended.

Mr. DAWSON. I should like to ask a question along the line suggested by the gentleman from Kansas.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAWSON. Is it not also true, in a measure, regarding furniture, that the same condition exists as is stated by the gentleman from New York with reference to machinery?

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, yes; the purchases of furniture have been, to use the very mildest term, most injudicious. The Public Printer, whatever his motive was, spent a very large amount of money unwisely, and any intelligent committee would have been able undoubtedly to have prevented a large amount of this injudicious expenditure.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that the furniture in the Printing Office shows any more lavish extravagance than the furniture in the committee rooms of the House of Representatives?

Mr. PERKINS. That is a question that the gentleman from Illinois is so peculiarly fitted to answer that I shall leave it to him to do it. [Laughter.] He has had charge of the new Office Building and the furnishing.

Mr. MANN. Not at all; but if they have any more expensive furniture over in the Printing Office than they have in the various committee rooms of the House, I will take a trip over and see it.

Mr. PERKINS. After all, it may be said that furniture suited to the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations is not necessary for the Public Printer, who receives men who come there to make reports on printing and binding.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly; I have been in the Office several times, but I never saw any evidence of extravagance in furniture over there. Probably that is the difference in the point of view.

Mr. PERKINS. There has been some furniture purchased lately. I think it would be wise to have it under the supervision of a committee of the House.

Mr. MANN. Here is a question as to the purchase of all the machines——

Mr. PERKINS. What does the Committee on Appropriations know about the details of the expenditure of the $5,000,000 they appropriate?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. They do not pass upon the details.

Mr. MANN. They do not pass upon the details; they do not determine whether one binding machine is better than another or anything of that kind.

Mr. PERKINS. We want to pass upon the details for the instruction and information of the Committee on Appropriations. We have no desire to take charge of the appropriation, but we feel that a wise supervision and examination of the details would be useful to that committee.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman tell us about printing ink purchased under contract? Is that supervised in any way?

Mr. PERKINS. No; it is not, as I understand. The only thing that is supervised is that purchases of all the supply of paper are supervised by the general Committee on Printing; that and nothing else.

Mr. MANN. Printing paper has been purchased under the jurisdiction of this committee?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from New York inform the special committee in reference to the price and quality of printing paper which has been purchased?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; we can furnish the committee with the price of all the paper that has been bought.

Mr. MANN. For how long past?

Mr. PERKINS. Five years that I have been on the committee, and I do not know how much longer.

Mr. MANN. The special committee will want the services of the gentleman, or somebody, to inform it with reference to the price and value of paper for a number of years past. We, as yet, have not been able to obtain any real data with reference to that, for some years past.

Mr. PERKINS. The records of the joint committee are open to your investigation.

Mr. MANN. We do not want to go and investigate the records of the Joint Committee on Printing; we have other things to do.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from New York spoke about the purchase of supplies and materials. I would like to ask him if it is not a fact that the general law which applies to the purchase of all supplies and materials in all of the Departments applies with equal force to supplies and materials for the Printing Office?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not know whether the general law applies.

Mr. TAWNEY. It does.

Mr. PERKINS. Then it has not been obeyed, because investigation has shown that contracts have been fixed beforehand, the price fixed beforehand, and bids received were changed and modified until finally the desired customer was reached, and then the contract was let. Those are things that could not occur if a committee of the House had supervision of them.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is a fact, is it not, that for a long time there was a bitter hostility in the office against the introduction of typesetting machines of every kind?

Mr. PERKINS. I have understood so.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And it has been a point of issue whether we were proceeding too fast or too slow in substituting machine typesetting for hand typesetting?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. So the fact that Mr. Rossiter in his investigation concluded that we had been proceeding too fast in installing typesetting machines would not be conclusive on the mind of the gentleman?

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, no; not necessarily.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. So it was a question of judgment, and a matter of dispute as to how fast we should proceed, and the Public Printer proceeded faster than he should?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not condemn the Public Printer or his predecessor. All I say is that I think, considering the size of the plant and the power, there should be a supervision over the Public Printer, vested in the committee that has charge of this branch of the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I wanted to find whether or not the gentleman claimed it conclusively appeared that we had proceeded too fast in getting typesetting machines?

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, no; I do not say that. I am not sure but that we did, but I am not in a position definitely to give that opinion.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] that during the sixteen years I have been in the House, the criticism on the part of the House has always been that the Public Printer was not installing typesetting machines as fast as he ought to do in order to save expense.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And I think that criticism was just.

Mr. PERKINS. There is no doubt the Public Printer was too slow in starting them.

Mr. MANN. And now he is too fast in doing it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has once more expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that debate is running by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] reserved a point of order on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SCOTT. I will ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. I just want to make a statement. The statement I desire to make is this, in answer to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH]: I happen to have learned that when the monotype machines were installed in the General Printing Office, they were used to print the bills which came to this House, among other documents. Prior to their installation the private pension bills, which were set up in great numbers, sent there from this House, were printed by hand, and by reason of the fact that a great portion of them could be "fatted," to use the printer's term, one printer could set four of those bills in an hour, on an average. After the installation of the machines, it took one printer using the machine one hour to print one of those bills.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is not that a question not to be affected by this? That is a question of the administration of the Office after the machines are in, as to what work the machines should be used on.

Mr. SCOTT. I think that any committee, whether they have any technical knowledge of the printing machine or not, would disapprove of any policy which would put in a hundred or more machines which it was possible to use to so great disadvantage as that.

Mr. TAWNEY. That matter is now under the jurisdiction of the Joint Committee on Printing. If the gentlemen of that committee wish to make an investigation, they can get the power to make any investigation they desire in regard to the administration of the Office, and for the last two years they have been engaged in a very expensive investigation.

Mr. SCOTT. And great reforms have been wrought. I only mention this as one unfortunate use of the printing machines.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman sure of his facts?

Mr. SCOTT. I have the authority of the foreman of one of the divisions of the Printing Office, who spoke from his personal knowledge and whose word I have not any reason in the world to question.

Mr. MANN. Of course I do not represent the Public Printer, but I have been told that the introduction of the machines over there has very greatly added to the rapidity of printing the bills, including the pension bills, and I feel warranted in saying that the information that the gentleman has is not correct; that it does not and never has taken one hour to set up a pension bill, an ordinary pension bill, with one of the machines.

Mr. SCOTT. As further evidence that the statement is correct, I may say that the present Public Printer has discontinued the use of the machines for the purpose of printing them.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This is a question of administration, after what has been put in there.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. What difference does it make whether the machines have been well used or ill used, and what objection, I would like to ask, too, of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations who reserved the point of order—what possible objection can there be, when it seems this power now rests solely in the hands of the Public Printer, to have that discretion revised and superintended by a committee of the House or a joint committee of the House and Senate?

Mr. MANN. You propose to change the discretion. You can not supervise discretion. You change it from the Public Printer to a committee of the House.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As I understand it, this amendment simply does away with the consent of the Public Printer.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from New York that when I reserved the point of order for the purpose of having the gentleman from New York fully explain his amendment, it was for the purpose of ascertaining whether it would be wise or unwise to agree to it. After considering the amendment and listening to the statement of the gentleman from New York I consider his proposition to be wholly impracticable. It is impracticable, not because the joint committee, when we have a joint committee, is not competent or because for a period of nine months every two years we have no joint committee.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; but this provision provides that during that time, if there are any contracts that have to be made, the power shall be vested in the Secretary of the Interior, which is precisely what the law is now in reference to the purchase of paper. When there is no joint committee here, then the Secretary of the Interior is vested with the power of the Joint Committee on Printing.

As a matter of fact we have had no trouble during all these years that the purchase of paper has been made in this way and there has been no trouble in letting the contracts. Now, if there has been no trouble in that, certainly, I think, my friend is mistaken.

Mr. TAWNEY. I said a moment ago to the gentleman from New York that contracts for paper are annual contracts. Now, the purchase of supplies and material for the Government Printing Office above $1,000 is going on all the time.

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, there are such things as the installation of machines——

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand there may be some particular purchases, but that is only occasionally, but the gentleman's amendment applies to all purchases for all materials above $1,000——

Mr. PERKINS. To large purchases.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, it would be just as reasonable to say that the Secretary of the Navy, in whose discretion expenditures aggregating $50,000,000 a year are made, before he can make any contract for material and before he can make any contract for supplies he should be required to submit that contract to the Committee on Naval Affairs for its approval.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the gentleman think——

Mr. TAWNEY. Just a moment.

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. This proposition is not new. At the beginning of our Government, Congress approved all contracts. The House of Representatives passed as a body upon nearly all contracts for the purchase of supplies or materials; but that was soon found to be impracticable, just as the proposition offered by the gentleman from New York will, if it is ever adopted, be found to be impracticable.

The purchase of all these supplies and material is governed by the general law that applies to all officers that exercise any discretion whatever in the expenditure of money for the purchase of supplies and material for the Departments. And the same authority that holds these executive officers to a compliance with the law also binds the Public Printer. Besides that, while he is an officer of the United States and no longer an officer of Congress, as he was formerly, and we have a committee of this House, and a joint committee of the two Houses authorized to supervise the administration of the Public Printer, nevertheless things are done in that Office, as they are done in all Departments, that should not be done.

Mr. PERKINS. We can supervise him just this way: We can go and find where he has made foolish contracts and wasted money and report it; but we want to have a supervision that will prevent waste.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, Mr. Chairman, if we had a permanent organization in both Houses of Congress, then the gentleman's argument would apply to the facts that he has stated, but we do not have a permanent organization of that kind and we are not in session—the House is not represented on the Joint Committee on Printing. In that case the gentleman proposes to turn this authority over to another Department of the Government. It seems to me the proposition is absolutely impracticable. Now, the criticism the gentleman makes in regard to the "audit system" can not be made against the Committee on Appropriations. That system originated with the Keep Commission. The Keep Commission originally recommended this "audit system," and authority was given in the sundry civil bill two years ago to inaugurate that system. The expenditures which were made were made out of this appropriation, but there was no material bought under that authorization, as the gentleman will see if he has examined the hearings.

The Public Printer has bought no material of any consequence. The balance of the money was spent for personal services and for equipment. Now, the amendment, Mr. Chairman, being a legislative limitation, changing the discretion of the Public Printer, which is now vested in him by law, to a joint committee of the two Houses, and then again transferring that discretion to the Secretary of the Interior when we do not have a joint committee, makes it a legislative limitation which is clearly obnoxious to the rule of the House.

Mr. PERKINS. In reference to the point of order, I submit that it is clearly a limitation, and is not a provision changing the law. It is pointed simply to this appropriation. It says for the appropriation made now of $5,300,000 a limitation shall be imposed upon its expenditure, and that none of that money shall be paid out except upon contracts made in a certain way.

After that appropriation is disposed of, Congress in the future can decree as it sees fit; but it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this is clearly a limitation in reference to this appropriation. This money shall be paid on certain things and shall not be paid on other things, to wit, shall not be paid on any contract that has not been executed in a certain way. What is the change of law in that? In various cases it has been held that Congress might as a limitation say that money should not be paid. Only yesterday the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole decided that it was not subject to a point of order to say that money appropriated for Soldiers' Homes should not be paid to any Soldiers' Home unless certain things were kept out of the Homes. The Board in charge of the Homes must not allow the sale of liquors within its buildings. There was a limitation put upon that appropriation of money.

Now, by this amendment we say that this money shall not be paid upon contracts unless they have been executed in a certain way. And I see no difference in principle between the point on which the Chair ruled yesterday, to say nothing of other innumerable rulings, and the question that is now presented.

Mr. TAWNEY. While that limitation took from the Board of Managers the discretion with respect to the sale of beer or the maintenance of canteens, it did not place the discretion anywhere else. The gentleman proposes to take from the Public Printer the discretion which is now vested in him by law and transfer that discretion to a joint committee, and subsequently, when we have no joint committee, to transfer the discretion to the head of another Department. It is, therefore, clearly a legislative limitation and not in order.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, not questioning the ruling made yesterday in regard to an amendment requiring the sanction of the inmates of a Soldiers' Home before a canteen could be maintained, it seems to me it went as far as it would be safe to go in that direction. Yet this proposed amendment goes a little further. Would not this amendment, if enacted into law, be construed as directly, or at least indirectly, conferring upon the Committee on Printing an authority and a discretion which it does not now possess? Would not the Public Printer assume that he had the right, and was indeed required, to call upon that committee for his guidance and assistance? And would not that committee feel authorized, under this provision, to take charge of the purchase of these printing machines—an authority which it does not now possess—and also the purchase of supplies and materials? If that would be the correct construction of this provision if enacted into law, then does it not change existing law in violation of the well-known rule of this House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the amendment is subject to the point of order, first, because it would vest in the Joint Committee on Printing the power that it does not have; secondly, the Secretary of the Interior power that he does not have, and third, it is a square legislative enactment by its very terms, and not a limitation, for it says:

Provided, That no payment shall be made for any material.

That is legislative enactment, not having reference alone to the appropriation here made, but to all future appropriations.

The Chair is clearly of the opinion it is subject to the point of order, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This I do for the purpose of asking the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] a question. I think I understood him to say that the purchase of paper for the Government Printing Office is in some sense under the supervision of his committee.

Mr. PERKINS. Entirely under the supervision of the committee. We let the contract.

Mr. OLMSTED. Can the gentleman state what price is paid by the Government for print paper at the present time?

Mr. PERKINS. I can not.

When the contracts were before us we knew which was the lowest bid—the gentleman may be assured of that.

Mr. OLMSTED. I can well understand that all these matters can not be carried in mind, but I hoped that the gentleman might remember the price paid by the Government for print paper. The reason I asked for the information was that I have received a letter this morning from a prominent newspaper publisher in Pennsylvania, who says:

The prices we have been paying for the last four years under annual contracts have been: 1905, $2.25 per hundred pounds; 1906, $2 per hundred pounds; 1907, $1.95 per hundred pounds, and 1908, $2.50.

Then he says:

With regard to the increased cost of print paper, I am forced to the conclusion that the big jump in price this year is due to a combination in restraint of trade rather than the tariff. Just the same, however, the increase in the cost of the production of a newspaper, owing to the jump in the price of white stock, is so serious as to imperil the legitimate business. It is particularly burdensome to newspapers like ours. It is not possible for me to say whether there is any real reason for the tremendous increase of price, but the fact that competition has been practically stifled indicates that something is radically wrong.

I had hoped the gentleman from New York, or some member of the committee might be able to tell us how the prices paid by the Government compare with the prices paid by the newspapers.

Mr. MANN. I think the Government does not use what is commonly known as "print paper." At least, I have never seen any that came from the Printing Office.

Mr. OLMSTED. It uses a better quality of paper than newspapers?

Mr. MANN. I would say it uses a better quality of paper than the newspapers.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The paper in the proof sheets is not better, is it?

Mr. MANN. Well, as far as I have seen, it is better. I think it is a heavier paper.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not an expert on paper, but I should judge that it is a very inferior quality.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may be right, I do not undertake to say.

Mr. OLMSTED. I think the Government buys a good deal of paper for use in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and in the printing of bills, and so forth, which is a better quality of paper, but I think the Government does use a good deal of print paper.

Mr. MANN. Oh, "print paper," yes. But the ordinary news paper is a lighter quality of paper than the print paper made from the ground pulp.

Mr. OLMSTED. Well, a comparison with the price paid by the Government would be valuable.

Mr. MANN. It would be valuable to know the price paid by the Government as compared with the price paid by the newspapers. The price paid by the Government this year is considerably in excess of what the prices were heretofore.

The Clerk read as follows:

For printing and binding for Congress, including the proceedings and debates, and for rents, $1,825,900. And printing and binding for Congress chargeable to this appropriation, when recommended to be done by the Committee on Printing of either House, shall be so recommended in a report containing an approximate estimate of the cost thereof, together with a statement from the Public Printer of estimated approximate cost of work previously ordered by Congress, within the fiscal year for which this appropriation is made.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa and Mr. SCOTT rose.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, there is one matter in connection with the Public Printing Office that I think ought to be known to every Member of the House, and it seems peculiarly appropriate to state it at this time. You will observe that this bill carries $49,080 for specific salaries of the Public Printing Office. Then it carries $5,300,000 for the public printing. Then that $5,300,000 is allotted to the various Departments and branches of the public service. But the appropriation is not "to the Navy Department" for a certain amount for printing, not "to the War Department" for a certain amount for printing, but to the Public Printer in a gross amount for printing, and that amount is then allotted among the different branches of the Government.

Mr. SCOTT. Is that allotment fixed in such a manner that if the War Department, for example, were not to use the entire amount allotted to that Department, the remainder can not be allotted to another Department?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I beg the gentleman's pardon; the purpose of this statement is to explain just what may be done and cover the point made by the gentleman. Now, the appropriation of $5,300,000 carried by this bill is for the public printing, so that the appropriation is not to a Department, not to Congress, but is to the Public Printing Office. We say to it, "You take that money and spend that money," and the subsequent clauses simply limit the amount of work that can be done for each branch of the public service at the Printing Office, and they credit them with that amount at that Office.

Now, the effect of that is this, that if they underestimate the cost on any piece of work the Department may get far more work done at the Public Printing Office than was allotted in the bill. That has constantly been going on for years. They have underestimated the cost of all their work, so that the annual estimates of the value of the product have never equaled the annual expense of the Office. They would express it "that they bought more than they sold," and what it means is that nobody has been charged as much as the actual cost for the work done. We say "For the State Department, $42,000." If they underestimate the value of the work for the State Department, they in effect give more to the State Department than Congress has authorized for that Department from this appropriation. Now, what has been the result?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Do they not have to take it from some other Department?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. They take it from the $5,300,000. They are entitled to draw all this money, and they are only entitled to charge to each branch of the service up to the amount here allotted to it; but if that scale be below the actual cost then the Department gets more than Congress meant it should get, in fact.

Now, that was a crying evil, and there was the need of an accurate method of ascertaining what the work of this Public Printing Office did cost, and there was a crying need for an audit system. I am not now discussing the worth of this audit system that was attempted to be installed there, but it was, above all things in that Office, important that we find out what the work was actually costing the Government of the United States, and not do work for every Department and charge it with only a fraction of what it cost to do the work.

Now, I will tell you what happened. We were giving a gross sum to the Public Printer and then making certain allotments to the various Departments. Those allotments have for a third of a century been subtracted from the gross appropriation to the Public Printing Office and the balance allotted to the Congress of the United States. So for the year 1904 there was allotted to Congress $3,382,137.

[The time of Mr. SMITH of Iowa having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The charges to Congress for that year were $2,248,666.49, leaving a balance of the allotment to Congress of $1,133,471 to be actually expended in doing work for all of the various Departments of the Government, underestimating the cost of it and charging it to their allotment, and Congress has thus received the odium of having squandered more than $1,000,000 in printing that Congress never had done at all.

Mr. SCOTT. Can the gentleman state whether his committee has ever inquired into that matter and found out how much printing is charged to Congress that as a matter of fact Congress never had?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is not charged to Congress directly.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask that question for the reason that in talking with employees in the Printing Office, with many of whom I am familiarly and personally acquainted, they say to me that it is constant talk among the employees there that whenever the allotment to any other Department of the Government is exhausted the word will be passed down, "Oh, charge it to Congress," no matter who it may be done for.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will say that the deputy head of this Government Printing Office denies that anything has been charged to Congress that ought to be charged to somebody else, but he takes the money allotted to Congress and does the work with it and undercharges for the work done for the other Departments of the Government.

Mr. SCOTT. It amounts to the same thing, does it not?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think so; but I am trying to make plain just what is done.

Now, in the year 1905 the allotment to Congress was $3,500,000, and the charges were $2,045,000, leaving the balance allotted never used, but absorbed in the work done for the other Departments of this Government. It was therefore essential, above all things, that we find what this work was actually costing us, and charge each Department with what it cost. Otherwise the Department gets far more than Congress allots, and Congress becomes charged with extravagant expenditures for printing that it, in fact, never had. I have had a statement prepared from the Government Printing Office showing how much has been allotted to each branch of the public service, how much has been charged to it, and how much has been absorbed by reason of their not charging the actual value of this work; and I ask unanimous consent that this table be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The table is as follows:

[d] Includes $1,910.71 in excess of allotment.
[e] To March 1, 1908.

Mr. SCOTT. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I should like to ask him how much of this sum of $1,825,900 is to be used in the payment of rents?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not able to inform the gentleman.

Mr. SCOTT. The attempt was made to segregate the amount that should be appropriated and charged to the printing of Congress?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It was not. I have just tried to make plain that what would be the expense of running the Public Printing Office next year an allotment was made for every branch of the public service except Congress, and the balance has been allotted to Congress.

Mr. SCOTT. This balance of $1,825,000 that is in this paragraph is not only allotted to Congress to pay for the printing, but also for the rents.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Rents in connection with the printing of Congress.

Mr. SCOTT. I desire to find out what buildings are rented.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I can not inform the gentleman now. The point I want to impress upon the House is that this Public Printing Office claims that the money is appropriated for the Office and not for the various Departments.

Mr. SCOTT. I am glad that the gentleman has made the statement for the reason I suggested a moment ago—that it has come to my knowledge that very much of the money charged to Congress ought not properly to be so charged.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The money is used, but there is nothing charged against it, so it shows a loss.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The Joint Committee on Printing has jurisdiction of the work the gentleman speaks of?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think they have.

Mr. DRISCOLL. They have not neglected their duty, have they?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not want to express an opinion upon that. I think they are fairly diligent.

Mr. DRISCOLL. These rents are included in the public printing for Congress?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. All through these appropriation bills are items carried for rent, but they do not state what buildings we are renting nor how much we are allowed for each Department. It strikes me that the Committee on Appropriations ought, when carrying items of this sort, to state what buildings they are paying rent for, so that Members of Congress may know how much we are paying out for rent, and so that people who read the appropriation bills or care anything about them may know how much we are paying out for rentals, because I think we might be disposed to build some buildings for housing of the Departments if we knew how much we were paying for rent.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There is nothing in the Book of Estimates as to what is being paid out of this appropriation for rents.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BOUTELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 29) to provide for registration of all cases of tuberculosis in the District of Columbia, for free examination of sputum in suspected cases, and for preventing the spread of tuberculosis in said District.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4812. An act to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Department of Agriculture, including not to exceed $25,000 for the Weather Bureau, and including the Annual Report of the Secretary of Agriculture, as required by the act approved January 12, 1895, and in pursuance of the provisions of public resolution No. 13 of the first session Fifty-ninth Congress, and also including not to exceed $125,000 for farmers' bulletins, which shall be adapted to the interests of the people of the different sections of the country, an equal proportion of four-fifths of which shall be delivered to or sent out under the addressed franks furnished by Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, as they shall direct, $460,000.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to inquire whether the amount carried in this paragraph is the same as that appropriated in the same paragraph last year.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is the same amount as I understand it.

Mr. SCOTT. The amount here is $460,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will wait a minute, I have the exact figures here. The amount carried in the current year is $433,750, and that for this year is $460,000.

Mr. SCOTT. An increase of about $30,000?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. May I inquire about the specific appropriation for publishing farmers' bulletins? The sum given here is $125,000, and I would like to ask whether that amount is the same as last year?

Mr. TAWNEY. That appropriation is increased, but I can not state to the gentleman the exact amount, because it is not carried in the figures I have here.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman thinks the amount has been increased?

Mr. TAWNEY. It has.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The appropriation last year was $433,750, and this year it is $460,000, an increase of $26,250, of which $5,000 is for the Weather Bureau and $21,000 for the farmers' bulletins.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman state what the estimate was?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Five hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. SCOTT. I was under the impression that $550,000 was the amount appropriated last year.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; $433,750 for the current year.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Then that was the largest amount ever given, and we give them that and an increase of $21,000 for the farmers' bulletins.

Mr. SCOTT. I am glad to get that information, and I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. DAWSON. Before that is done, I would like to ask the Chairman of the committee, or the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, for some explanation as to why individual allotment of farmers' bulletins to Members of this House have been cut down within the last two or three years? Is it by reason of lack of appropriation, or some other reason?

Mr. SCOTT. I think the only reason there can be given for it is the increase in the cost of printing, as the gentleman from Minnesota has suggested. The gentleman has also stated that the appropriation this current year for printing farmers' bulletins is larger than the appropriation for the preceding year. There was no reason why the amount should be cut down except that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Twenty-six thousand dollars more this year than last year.

Mr. DAWSON. Is there any good reason why the cost of printing should be increased?

Mr. SCOTT. I will have to refer the gentleman to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. I don't think the cost of printing has increased very much. They are charging the Department the actual cost of printing. They used to charge the Departments less, probably, some time ago than the actual cost of the printing.

Mr. TAWNEY. Not probably, but as a matter of fact.

Mr. DAWSON. Then I can only commend that matter to the attention of the distinguished Committee on Printing.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For reprinting 2,000 copies of the advance sheets of the soil surveys of Montgomery and Davidson counties, in the State of Tennessee, to be distributed through the folding room of the House of Representatives, under the provisions of the joint resolution No. 9, approved March 14, 1904, Statutes at Large, volume 33, part 1, page 583, $900.

Mr. TAWNEY. I make the point of order against that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will reserve it for a moment.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I can not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not believe the gentleman would make it if he fully understood the merits of the proposition.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, I fully understand the merits of the proposition. The gentleman from Tennessee was here at my desk for the last half hour trying to convince me.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; the gentleman only gave me two minutes and a half.

Mr. TAWNEY. I reserve the point of order for two minutes and a half.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. All right. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the surveys—I hope the gentleman who made the point of order will listen to what I am saying, as well as the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT], who I see is going out—"the guilty fleeth when no man pursueth." [Laughter.] This survey was made about six years ago, and every one of the advance sheets have been sent out to the farmers in that great section of the country. In Montgomery and Robertson and Stewart and Cheatham counties the main crop was tobacco.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. I would like to inquire whether or not the gentleman has heard from any of the farmers who received these sheets?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I assure the gentleman that I have heard from them, and by letter and telephone and in person they have importuned me to get copies of this soil survey.

Mr. SCOTT. I am asking whether the gentleman has heard from the farmers who have already had the copies?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly; and the farmers want copies, seeing the benefit the farmer who had the copy has derived from following the direction of Doctor Wilson, and they have been very much encouraged and say they want to get Doctor Wilson's prescription.

Mr. SCOTT. I am very much surprised to hear that statement.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is one of the old surveys, Mr. Chairman, and was made five or six years ago. The influence of the teachings and the showing of these maps and the directions as given by those soil experts has percolated and gotten into the heads and hearts of some of the people, and they have profited by it. So those who have not been able to get any copies of the survey want to get copies, so that they, too, may derive the benefit that the others have derived from it. These are the facts. In other words, it is an old survey and great benefit has come from it. Those who have not copies want to get them, so that they may derive the same benefits as some of their neighbors who have. An insufficient number was printed at first. They made a survey in Montgomery County, a tobacco county, and then they made a survey in Davidson, which is a garden and horticultural county—nontobacco. Our people are diversifying their crops and want these sheets, which show that you can, on that kind of soil, raise profitably strawberries; you can raise fruit profitably on that soil, and so on, and the farmers have taken that advice, and they have succeeded admirably. There are others owning lands around there that are similar to the lands in Montgomery County, and they want to diversify their crops, and they want to get the prescription that the Government, through Secretary Wilson, gave in these sheets or surveys. He went there to make one speech and made five. He went there to stay one day and stayed about a week, and he talked to our farmers. They believed in him, and they believe in what he says. They believe in the prescription and the directions he has given in these soil surveys. It is a little pittance of $893 that I ask for more than 250,000 constituents.

And yet we have millions and millions of dollars—Mr. Chairman, just a moment—given away here to all sorts of publications, right here in the face of this bill, and yet here is the bone and sinew of my great country asking you to give them this reprint that they may diversify their crops, and they are being denied it.

Mr. TAWNEY. How many were originally printed?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not know, but not enough to go around. The Secretary kept a lot for himself, and yet——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a minute more—he gave me all the copies he had for his own private use for my people, so great has been the demand. Now, I hope, under the circumstances, and I am not asking much—it is only about $893—the gentleman will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. DAWSON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. DAWSON. Is it not possible to secure a reprint of this document through the Committee on Printing, without the necessity of inserting the item in this bill?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have introduced a bill to do so, and that committee is unable so far to get the estimates for all cases like mine, but I have got the estimates here as to my district on this piece of paper, which estimate I was able to secure this morning and not before.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Give that to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And I have introduced a bill for that purpose, but here is the actual condition: The farmers are asking me to get this reprint. I am not asking for millions, nor am I asking for anything new; I am asking for simple justice for those people.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Minnesota to insist upon his point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Supreme Court of the United States, $10,000; and the printing for the Supreme Court shall be done by the printer it may employ, unless it shall otherwise order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting an explanation regarding this section from the gentleman from Minnesota, who is in charge of the bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, the gentleman has not asked me to explain anything yet, as far as I know.

Mr. SULZER. I want the gentleman to explain why the words "shall be done by the printer it may employ" are used? Why not have this printing done in the usual manner, in the usual way that all Government printing is done? Why this departure?

Mr. TAWNEY. This language is in here for the purpose of giving the Supreme Court of the United States exclusive control over whatever amount of printing they have to have done. It may be that a certain portion of their printing should be done secretly. They do not want to give to the public their opinions in advance of their being delivered, and that is the entire purpose, to protect the right of the Supreme Court to have such printing as they want to have done without its being made public. It has always been the rule and this is no new thing.

Mr. SULZER. Some of us were under the impression that perhaps on account of recent decisions which the court has rendered against organized labor it could not get organized-labor printers to print the decisions and had to get them printed elsewhere.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, I will say to the gentleman from New York that the Supreme Court of the United States has not been driven to the necessity of going out of the ordinary routine for printing because of any decision that it has ever rendered, which decision was rendered in accordance with the law and the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. SULZER. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman if the court can get its decisions printed in this country?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I think I can say for the members of the typographical union that there has never been a time and there is never likely to be a time when they will not be willing as members of that organization to do any printing which the Government or any department of it may require. [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Exactly, and hence I do not see the reason for having this peculiar provision in the bill. Why not have the printing done as all other Government printing is done?

Mr. TAWNEY. I say this language has no relation whatever to the subject which the gentleman is mentioning purely for political purposes.

Mr. SULZER. Well, I only want to say that I can not understand why Congress should make a departure in its printing methods in regard to one branch of the Government. I simply wanted information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Public Printer to comply with the provisions of the law granting thirty days' annual leave to the employees of the Government Printing Office, $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment to that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 168, after line 3, insert:
"Section 3 of the act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents, approved March 1, 1907, is hereby repealed."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order on that.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLMSTED in the chair). The gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] reserves the point of order, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] makes the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I reserve it. I would like to know what the proposition is.

Mr. TAWNEY. This section of the law was extended at the last session of Congress. It is necessary for us to extend it for another year, if it is not repealed. The section of the law reads as follows:

That after June 30, 1907, no part of the expense of the administration of the office of superintendent of documents shall be charged to any appropriation or allotment of appropriation for the public printing and binding, but shall be otherwise specifically appropriated for. The administration of said office of superintendent of documents shall be under the direction of the Public Printer as heretofore.

Now, when that section was written in the law it was contemplated that the Public Printer would be required to submit his estimates for the document room and for all of the clerical services in the office of the Public Printer, and that Congress on those estimates would appropriate specifically for that service as we appropriate specifically for all other executive services.

I would say that the Public Printer submitted his detailed estimates for all the clerical services in the Government Printing Office, including the document room. At that time, or about the time that Congress convened, the Public Printer was suspended. His administration of the office was under investigation. When the legislative bill was prepared, in which bill these specific estimates should be appropriated for, it was impossible to get any official of the Government Printing Office to come before the committee and explain the necessity for the salaries which were specifically estimated for for the first time. Thereupon it was decided by the subcommittee having charge of the legislative bill to defer the consideration of these specific estimates until we came to make up the sundry civil appropriation bill. But during the preparation of the sundry civil appropriation bill the committee was in the same dilemma that it was at the time of the preparation of the legislative bill.

The Acting Public Printer appeared before the committee in respect to these detailed estimates, but in view of the fact that he did not make the estimates, in view of the fact that he was to be succeeded by another later on, he did not feel justified in expressing his opinion regarding the estimates that had been submitted. So that it became necessary for the committee to again appropriate for this service, as Congress has heretofore appropriated for the service, in a lump sum, with the exception of the offices that are specifically provided for in this bill, which offices have been specifically appropriated for heretofore in the legislative bill. Now, that includes the document room, and of course it will be necessary to repeal or to extend the operation of this section or close up the document room. There is no necessity of continuing the section any longer, inasmuch as the law now requires the Public Printer at the next session to submit detailed estimates, and of course upon those detailed estimates the committee will make the appropriations specifically for all of the clerical service outside of the operating department of the Government Printing Office.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does not the gentleman try now to repeal the law that requires the submission of detailed estimates?

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, no; we carry the provision in this bill again requiring him to submit detailed estimates.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why is the gentleman trying to repeal?

Mr. TAWNEY. For the reason that out of these appropriations that we are now making for the next fiscal year the Public Printer must necessarily have authority to expend the money necessary to maintain the document room. Section 3 prohibits that expenditure unless the operation of the section is extended for another year or the section is entirely repealed. I have a letter here from the Acting Public Printer calling to our attention the necessity for doing this. It does not change any condition whatever.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The law goes into effect next year that will require detailed estimates to be made?

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

First. For salaries of officers and employees of the Isthmian Canal Commission, including assistant purchasing and shipping agents, and all other employees in the United States, $149,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I want to find out by what authority of law the Canal Commission is building macadam roads on the Canal Zone. I have looked through this appropriation without finding any paragraph appropriating money for such a purpose. In the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations which visited the Zone last fall, it appeared that they had spent about four or five hundred thousand dollars in building macadam roads. The Government of the United States has never adopted the policy of building macadam roads in New Mexico or Arizona or any Territory belonging to the United States within our own borders. I do not understand by what authority of law they are expending these large sums of money in building macadam roads. They call them "towpaths," I believe; but investigation shows that they are ordinary wagon macadam roads, leading out to some little settlement where somebody lives.

Mr. KEIFER. Where is this macadam road built?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The chairman of the committee will explain it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the authority for the work that the Isthmian Canal Commission is doing in connection with the construction of roads is the same authority that exists for the construction of the canal. The roads to which the gentleman from South Carolina refers are roads that are necessary to the work of canal construction and the administration of the affairs of the Canal Zone. If the gentleman from South Carolina should visit the Zone during the rainy season—say in the month of November—I am satisfied he would not even stop to inquire whether anybody had authority to build a road, but he would do a great deal of emphatic talking in criticism of the Commission for not having constructed roads that would enable him to travel without getting into mud up to his knees. The authority certainly is the same as that for the construction of the canal. It is one of the incidents of the general authority to construct the canal itself.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Apropos of that proposition, I wish to ask the gentleman whether these roads referred to are constructed under the Good Roads Division of the Agricultural Department? [Laughter.]

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say, for the information of my friend from Indiana and the special friend of the Good Roads Division of the Agricultural Department, that so far as I know that Division of the Agricultural Department has not yet penetrated into the wilds of the Canal Zone. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Has it supervised any case of construction of public highways or any other kind of Government construction?

Mr. TAWNEY. In the Canal Zone?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Anywhere.

Mr. TAWNEY. Anywhere? I do not know of any. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second. For incidental expenses, including rents, cable and telegraph service, supplies, stationery and printing, and actual necessary traveling expenses in the United States (including rent of the Panama Canal building in the District of Columbia, $7,500, and text-books and books of reference, $1,000, and additional compensation to the Auditor for the War Department for extra services in auditing accounts of the Isthmian Canal, $1,000), $27,000, and the unexpended balances of appropriations for these objects available June 30, 1908.

Mr. NEEDHAM. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, we are now considering the appropriations for the construction of the Panama Canal, the completion of which will without doubt lead to increased commerce between the Atlantic and the Pacific, and make necessary the building of more harbors, especially upon the Pacific.

I will ask to have read the following dispatch to the Washington Post of May 4.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Washington Post, May 4, 1908.]

BATTLE SHIPS IN STORM—THE ILLINOIS NARROWLY AVERTS CRASH WITH ALABAMA—1,000 SAILORS KEPT ASHORE—UNABLE TO RETURN TO SHIPS DURING GALE, THEY SPENT NIGHT ON MONTEREY FLOORS—ILLINOIS LOSES HER ANCHOR, ALABAMA HAS GANGWAY TORN OFF, AND ADMIRAL SPERRY'S LAUNCH IS BEACHED.

MONTEREY, CAL., May 3, 1908.

A northwest gale, sweeping into the harbor, gave the eight ships of the second division of the Atlantic fleet several hours of watchfulness last night and cut off all communication with shore.

A serious accident was narrowly averted when the battle ship Illinois, second in line from the Alabama, flagship of Rear-Admiral Sperry, parted her anchor chain in the height of the blow and went drifting toward the shore. The Illinois headed directly for the Alabama, and it looked for a time as though a collision was imminent. But heroic work by the helmsman managed to steer the drifting ship away, and the only damage done was the tearing away of the port gangway of the Alabama. The Illinois drifted fully 800 yards before her emergency anchors, sent spinning into the white-capped waters, finally held fast.

The wind continued to-day, and the Illinois made no attempt to regain her position in the fourth division column. As early as 9 o'clock last night it was announced that no more steam launches would run between the ships and the shore. Many little stout steamers that already had made the shore were held in the sheltered waters, and the launches near the ships were hauled out of the water.

ONE THOUSAND LIBERTY MEN ASHORE.

A thousand liberty men were ashore, and the problem of finding a place for them to sleep severely taxed the available buildings in Monterey. The patrol officers on duty had to share the lot of the men and sleep on hard pine floors, with only their capes to protect them.

Admiral Sperry's barge from the Alabama had a hole stove in her bow as a result of a collision with the ship's gangway, and was beached later in the night. A schooner laden with lime also went ashore, and a gasoline launch, in which an unfastened lighted lantern had been left burning, caught fire and went to the bottom.

It is believed that the anchor lost from the Illinois when the cable parted last night may not be recovered, as the water is too deep for divers to work in. All of the ships managed to send boats to the shore to-day at intervals. It was said, however, that if the blow continued it might delay the departure of the second squadron ships from Santa Cruz to-morrow.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have had that dispatch read to show the absolute necessity of the Government of the United States improving the harbor at Monterey. For the last five years I have endeavored to obtain an appropriation to build a breakwater at that point. In the river and harbor bill which passed some years ago there was a provision for a survey and estimate of cost for a breakwater at Monterey, Cal. The report of the local engineer was favorable, but when the recommendation reached Washington and came before the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors that Board reported against it. Twice since then this Board has reaffirmed that position.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the Congress of the United States should not extend to an engineer board here in Washington such great power in these matters. In other words, the policy of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has been that it will make no appropriation unless the project is favorably recommended by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors. However excellent these gentlemen may be as engineers, they are certainly not competent to pass upon the commercial possibilities of the country. Besides, there is no harbor of refuge between San Francisco and Port Harford, a distance of over 200 miles.

You will notice from the dispatch that the Government of the United States narrowly escaped the loss of a million or two million dollars, as would have possibly been the case had the collision taken place. The estimated cost of the breakwater at Monterey is only $1,000,000. The Government of the United States just escaped losing a great deal more than that by that storm. It is only periodically that these storms occur, and then there is an undertow which causes the danger to vessels. I want to place that dispatch in the RECORD, so that it may be before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, so that it may be of record when we come to act on the next river and harbor bill, and thus have one basis, at least, for making an appropriation to improve the harbor at Monterey. This improvement is demanded not only for safety, but from the commercial standpoint. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says the dispatch illustrates the necessity of improving our harbors to accommodate the needs of the Navy we are constructing. To my mind it is a practical illustration of the folly of constructing battle ships we do not have the facilities to accommodate with safety in our ports and harbors.

The Clerk read as follows:

Eighth. For pay of officers and employees other than skilled and unskilled labor in the service of the government of the Canal Zone, $225,000 and the unexpended balances of appropriations for these objects available June 30, 1908.

Mr. RAINEY. I make the point of order against paragraph 8, on page 170.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. RAINEY. The point of order is that the paragraph is contrary to existing law. It makes an appropriation for the payment of judicial officers and executive officers of courts in the Canal Zone whose business there is to enforce certain laws attempted to be put into operation by Executive order.

This is the eighth clause of the appropriation made, according to the caption here, for the purpose of continuing the construction of the Isthmian Canal in accordance with an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, approved June 28, 1902."

I undertake to say that if there is any authority at all to be found in existing law for the government of the Canal Zone as administered at the present time or at any time, it is to be found in this act, under which this appropriation purports to be made.

Not long ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] introduced a resolution calling upon the President of the United States to inform the House by what authority of law he has exercised the functions of government on the Panama Canal Zone since the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress, and in response to that resolution the President advised the House in his message—transmitted to the House on the 4th day of April, 1908, document No. 852 of the first session, Sixtieth Congress—that he was maintaining civil government in the Canal Zone pursuant to authority conferred upon him by the treaty between the United States and Panama concluded November 18, 1903, and the acts of Congress approved June 28, 1902, April 28, 1904, March 3, 1905, December 21, 1905, June 30, 1906, and March 4, 1907.

I am familiar with the rule, and I understand that when I challenge the paragraph for the reason I have given it is incumbent upon the other side to show under what authority of law the appropriation is made.

But without waiting for some gentleman on the other side to make that explanation, I want to discuss these several acts briefly. This is an important matter—the most important in this bill. The Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty, referred to by the President of the United States, simply provides in its second article as follows:

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, etc., of the Panama Canal.

Then it proceeds to tell how wide the zone is and how far it extends out into the sea on either side. In other words, we made an agreement with the Republic of Panama, at that time authorized by international law to enter into an agreement of this kind, by which we agreed to enact laws for the government of the particular territory so turned over to us. This particular territory, therefore, became as much a part of the United States as any territory embraced within the boundaries of continental United States. When a sovereign power confers upon another sovereign power the "use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water," that operates absolutely to annex that particular tract of land. This convention provided that we should be permitted to enact necessary laws for the government of the Canal Zone. We agreed to enact such laws. The "use, occupation, and control" of the zone of land specified means that if it means anything.

Under the Spooner Act we provided for the temporary government of the Canal Zone, and the Spooner Act is the act the President refers to as being the act of Congress approved June 28, 1902. This act was passed in advance of any convention between the United States and the Republic of Panama—passed at a time when we had no authority whatever to exercise any jurisdiction on the Canal Zone. This act simply provided that, if at some time in the future we should enter into a convention with the Republic of Panama and acquire possession of any land there, or the use and control of any land, the President was authorized temporarily to provide for sanitation of the land so acquired and for police regulation there.

After that Congress passed the act of April 28, 1904, the act under which we now propose to make this appropriation, and we so specify in the bill now under consideration. At the time this act was passed we had entered into the convention with Panama to which I have just called attention.

Now, we are appropriating money for the purpose of administering courts, providing for the payment of executive officers of courts and judges of courts, by virtue of the act of April 28, 1904. We are proceeding upon that theory and we say that in this bill. If there is anything in that act authorizing this appropriation it is to be found in the second section of the act, and the second section of the act provides:

SEC. 2. That until the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of the Canal Zone be sooner made by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers, as well as the power to make all rules and regulations necessary for the government of the Canal Zone, and all the rights, powers, and authority granted by the terms of said treaty to the United States shall be vested in such person or persons and shall be exercised in such manner as the President shall direct for the government of said Zone and maintaining and protecting the inhabitants thereof in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

This act therefore provided for the government of the Canal Zone until what period? Until the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress, and the act told how it should be done. It repealed by implication the Spooner Act, if there was anything left of the Spooner Act after we entered into our convention with Panama. If it is contended that under that act we are attempting to conduct courts down there, this act operates to repeal it.

The committee recognized that, because they made appropriations in the bill now under consideration under the act that simply provides for the government of the Canal Zone until the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress. The Fifty-eighth Congress expired by operation of law on the 4th day of March, 1905. Prior to the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress there had been enacted, under authority of the section I have just read, certain laws for the government of the Canal Zone, making a volume of 241 pages, the volume comprising something like twenty-one acts, each act providing as follows:

By the authority of the President of the United States, be it enacted by the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Now, there was some warrant of law for the issue of the volume of laws which I hold in my hand, but whether or not these laws are still in force does not make any difference in the consideration of this point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the gentleman think that the Congress of the United States could delegate to the President of the United States or anybody else the power to legislate?

Mr. RAINEY. I think that matter is worthy of consideration, and I doubt whether such power could be delegated. But, assuming that Congress has the power to do that, and did do it, we are not appropriating in this bill, in this particular clause, anything for the purpose of paying officers of courts created by virtue of the book of laws known as the "Laws of the Canal Zone," which comprises all the laws enacted by the authority of the President of the United States prior to the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress. Since that time and without any authority at all the President has been making laws on the Canal Zone by Executive order.

Now, the President continues, in his report, which I have here, and calls attention to other acts since the act of April 28, 1904, and says that by virtue of the act of March 3, 1905, he has also enacted and administered laws on the Canal Zone; and the act of March 3, 1905, is the urgent deficiency bill of that year. He says that by virtue of the act of December 21, 1905, he is also continuing to exercise the functions of government in the Canal Zone, and the act of December 21, 1905, is the act that appropriates $11,000,000 for the purpose of continuing the work on the Canal Zone.

He further says that by virtue of the act of June 30, 1906, he is making laws for the Canal Zone, and the act of June 30, 1906, is the sundry civil bill of that year. Then he says he is also continuing the administration of the government of the Canal Zone by virtue of the act of March 4, 1907, and that act is the sundry civil bill of that year. Next year, if this question is raised, he will include also this bill we are now considering, and clause 8 on page 170, against which I make the point of order.

Since the authority of the President directly and indirectly to create laws for the Canal Zone was terminated by virtue of the terms of the act of April 28, 1904, he has issued by Executive order the book of laws, known as the "Code of Civil Procedure of the Canal Zone," which I hold in my hand, and which comprises 197 pages, published and promulgated under this Executive order, which is printed on the first page of the book:

Under authority vested in me by law, it is ordered that the within code of civil procedure shall be in force within the Canal Zone on and after May 1, 1907.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 22, 1907.

The offices to be paid for by this appropriation were created not by the laws adopted prior to the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress, but by virtue of an Executive order issued from the White House, effective on April 15, 1907, issued March 13, 1907, signed by the President of the United States, which reads as follows:

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

Under authority vested in me by law it is ordered:

1. The Canal Zone, Isthmus of Panama, shall be divided into four administrative districts, to be known as Ancon, Emperador, Gorgona, and Cristobal. The districts of Ancon and Emperador shall be coextensive with the present municipal districts of Ancon and Emperador. The district of Gorgona shall be composed of the present municipal district of Gorgona and that portion of the municipal district of Buenavista lying south and east of a straight line passing through the center of the Panama Railroad Company's bridge No. 38 over the Agujeta River, and intersecting the boundaries of the Canal Zone with an inclination of forty degrees east of the magnetic meridian. The district of Cristobal shall be composed of the present municipal district of Cristobal and that portion of the municipal district of Buenavista lying north and west of a straight line passing through the center of the Panama Railroad Company's bridge No. 38 over the Agujeta River, and intersecting the boundaries of the Canal Zone with an inclination of forty degrees east of the magnetic meridian.

2. In each district there shall be appointed a tax collector, who shall discharge the duties of the present municipal treasurer and board of assessors. He shall be charged with the collection of license taxes, the assessment and collection of all ad valorem taxes, the preparation of head lists for work upon public improvements and the issuance of citations and collection of commutation taxes thereunder, the keeping of the civil register, the collection of rents from public and municipal property, the execution of leases thereof under direction of the collector of revenues, and in the proper case with the approval of the chief executive of the Canal Zone, the execution of deeds therefor. He shall also represent the municipality in all necessary litigation affecting municipal property within his district and shall from time to time discharge such other duties of a public nature as may be assigned to him by the duly authorized authorities of the Canal Zone. He shall keep books or rolls showing all assessments made, taxes and rents due, and collections made, and shall give such bond as may be required of him. He shall report to the collector of revenues and deposit all funds as he may be required with the treasurer of the Canal Zone.

3. The existing regulations concerning the assessment and collection of taxes and the enforcement of tax liens shall be followed and applied by the tax collector so far as the same are not inconsistent with the terms of this order. Unpaid taxes of every character shall constitute a personal claim against the person against whom they are levied, and taxes upon real property shall, in addition, until paid, constitute a lien upon the realty. With respect to ad valorem taxes or other taxes levied by assessment, an appeal shall be allowed to the circuit judge for the district following a procedure to be prescribed by the circuit judges, by the owner or occupant in all cases where the assessment may be thought to be unduly high, and by the collector of revenues in all cases where it may be thought to be unduly low, when compared with assessments made upon similar property similarly situated elsewhere in the Zone. For the purpose of equalizing assessments in the several districts the three circuit judges shall once a year sit as a board of equalization.

4. There shall be appointed in each district a district judge, who shall exercise all the authority now exercised by the municipal judges, and shall discharge such other duties as may from time to time be imposed upon him by law or Executive order. There shall also be appointed for the whole Zone a fifth district judge, to be known as the senior district judge, who shall sit wherever required of him and who shall once a month preside at and keep minutes of a conference of all the district judges at which matters of common interest pertaining to their office shall be discussed. Any district judge may temporarily be assigned to sit in any other district. Fines and fees shall be accounted for to the collector of revenues and paid in to the treasurer of the Canal Zone.

5. Public works and improvements in the several districts shall be under the charge and direction of a superintendent of public works appointed for the whole Zone, who shall also have charge and direction of slaughterhouse and market inspectors and shall discharge such other duties of a public character relative to the various districts as may be assigned to him.

6. Accounts shall be kept by the collector of revenues with each district and public improvements shall be distributed among the several districts with due regard to the revenue derived from each district. Rents derived from municipal property shall in all cases be expended upon public improvements or schools within the district from which it is collected.

7. Ordinances regulating police, sanitation and taxation, and any other matters now regulated by ordinance, may be enacted, and existing ordinances may be repealed, by the Isthmian Canal Commission, with the approval of the Secretary of War. They may be made operative throughout the Zone or confined to any particular district.

8. The municipal councils and all other municipal offices now existing under the laws of the Canal Zone are abolished.

9. The district officers herein provided for shall be appointed and their salaries fixed by the chief executive of the Canal Zone, subject to approval by the Commission.

10. The rules and regulations of the Isthmian Canal Commission compiled under the title of "Laws of the Canal Zone," in so far as they are inconsistent with this order, are modified and repealed.

Effective April 15, 1907.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 13, 1907.

We are, therefore, proposing to pay out of this appropriation, against which I make the point of order, district judges made possible and appointed by virtue of an Executive order issued from the White House on the 13th day of March, 1907, over two years after the authority given the President or any commission to make laws on the Isthmus of Panama had absolutely expired.

I have here, and it has been printed heretofore in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], the reasons given by the Attorney-General to the President by virtue of which the Code of Civil Procedure of the Canal Zone was enacted by the President, and under which, since that time, every Executive order affecting the Canal Zone has been issued. He simply says in his opinion, in reply to a letter from the President, that Congress did not provide a method of governing the Canal Zone after the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress—after March 4, 1905—and because Congress has provided no way since then of making laws for the Canal Zone, and because they need laws down there, therefore the President of the United States has the right under the Constitution and under the organic law to make laws for the government of a strip of land 10 miles wide and 46 miles long. That is the reason given by the Attorney-General.

The President does not take any chances whatever in his reply to the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON]. He simply says "by virtue of all these acts I am issuing laws for the government of the Canal Zone and determining what judges shall be created down there and what the executive officers of the courts shall be." Then he calls attention to all these appropriation acts. Now, the process of enacting laws ex necessitate rei is a new method in this Republic. It is a new idea everywhere, so far as I know. If the Attorney-General is right in his contention that because Congress has refused to pass needed laws for the Canal Zone therefore the President has a right to do it, then the President, if Congress fails to pass the laws it ought to pass at this session, following the same method of reasoning, has the right to enact them himself by Executive order. If the Attorney-General is right about it in his opinion, then as soon as Congress adjourns, under the same reasoning, the President will have the right, by Executive order, to put into effect a law placing wood pulp and print paper on the free list. This might not satisfy a great many Republicans, although it is much-needed legislation, and the Republican majority do not seem disposed to permit this legislation to pass.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit, I want to call his attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that we are appropriating or proposing to appropriate under this paragraph for the compensation or salary of officers, whose offices were created, whose duties were prescribed under the authority of the act which the gentleman has just read. Now, the rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioners during the existence of this authority is perpetual until it is repealed, modified, or changed by some subsequent competent authority. We are not appropriating for any officers or for any administration that is supposed to be created or carried under any legislation that was enacted since the power and authority which the gentleman claims has become inoperative because of——

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I have failed utterly to make my position understood by the gentleman from Minnesota. I am aware of the fact that the attempt is being made to appropriate for the payment of these officers under the act of April 28, 1904.

I am aware of that. I started out with that proposition, and I called attention to page 169 of the bill here, where the bill states in terms that these appropriations, beginning with clause 1 and extending through clause 8 and ending with some subsequent clause, are made by virtue of the act of 1904, and the gentleman from Minnesota calls my attention to the fact that according to his position we are making appropriations for the payment of officers created under the act of 1904. I take issue with him upon that position, because here is an Executive order dated March 13, 1907, effective April 15, 1907, signed by the President of the United States, which is now the authority under which the judges are appointed, their duties explained, their districts defined, and their salaries paid. This Executive order was passed two years and eight days after the termination by operation of law of the life of the Fifty-eighth Congress.

There are few if any judges of courts on the Isthmus now holding office under the act of 1904. They have all been appointed and are acting under subsequent Executive orders issued absolutely without authority. We are simply proposing to pay these officers who have no existence in law.

Now, the President of the United States addressed a letter to the Attorney-General on the 21st of January, 1907. The Fifty-ninth Congress remained in session until March 4, 1907. Forty-two days remained before the final adjournment of the Fifty-ninth Congress by operation of law, and yet on the 21st day of January, 1907, the President wrote a letter to the Attorney-General—and I have it here—asking if under the law and the Constitution he could go ahead and make some laws himself for the Canal Zone. At that time the President was sending to Congress numerous messages on such weighty subjects as the size of a man's family, the way to conduct country churches, simplified spelling, and other similar matters. He absolutely failed, however, to call the attention of Congress to the fact that a more important matter—a matter affecting the government of 5,000 young Americans who had gone down on the Canal Zone—had been neglected by Congress. He said, in effect, to the Attorney-General: "There is no authority now under the act of 1904 for me to continue enacting laws for the Canal Zone, and there seems to be nobody else to do it, therefore is there not some way by which I can continue to do it?"

We have had 204 messages and official communications transmitted to the Congress from the White House since the act of 1904 went into effect, and in not one of them did the President call the attention of the Congress to the fact that he had no longer authority to administer laws for the Canal Zone, but on the 21st day of January, 1907, when he wrote to the Attorney-General, instead of sending one of his numerous messages to the House calling the attention of the Republican majority—who are responsible, as they themselves admit, for all legislation that is enacted and all that is not enacted by Congress—to the omission on their part to provide proper laws for the government of the Canal Zone. Instead of doing that, and while Congress was in session, over forty days before it adjourned, he asked the Attorney-General how he could do it without the assistance of Congress and without letting Congress and the country know anything about it. The Attorney-General said in reply, "Congress has failed to do it, therefore you can do it ex necessitate rei."

Now, the Attorney-General might simply have answered the President of the United States, and he answered him nine days before Congress adjourned and said, "Congress is in session; ask them to give you some authority," but instead of doing that he said, "You can do it yourself because Congress has failed to do it." Under that sort of procedure—that un-American method—laws have been made for the Canal Zone since that time. This appropriation can not be sustained upon the theory that it is being made for the purpose of carrying on some continuing work in progress on the Canal Zone. There is no law under which this appropriation can be permitted to remain in this bill. If it goes out, of course it is necessary for Congress to remain here and pass some laws for the government of the Canal Zone. I know of no reason why they should not do it—why Members should shirk this duty to go back to their homes in order to attend and participate in political conventions. There is no other way under the law and under the Constitution by which they can administer the affairs of government on the Canal Zone than by enacting proper laws in a proper manner for that purpose. That is all I care to say for the present, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KEIFER. Only a moment, Mr. Chairman. I understand the distinguished gentleman to ask you to uphold the point of order which he has made against the eighth paragraph under the caption in the bill of the "Isthmian Canal" on the theory that the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and the Attorney-General have been entirely in error in their construction of the law giving them the power to govern the Canal Zone. I think that is a pretty big request to be made on a simple point of order, but without stopping now, for it is unnecessary to go into the intricacies of these statutes and give them construction, I think it is reasonable for you to assume that they have deliberately through the years with the assent of Congress properly interpreted these laws as to the power the President possesses in governing the Canal Zone. But I desire, Mr. Chairman, to call attention especially to the paragraph against which the point of order is made. It is as follows:

8. For pay of officers and employees other than skilled and unskilled laborers in the service of the government of the Canal Zone, $225,000, and the unexpended balances of appropriations for these objects available June 30, 1908.

The paragraph itself shows that the object for which the appropriation is made, is to continue an object already existing and appropriated for in this fiscal year. We are now doing the same thing under the law that was passed by the last Congress, to wit, providing for the pay of skilled and unskilled laborers in the Canal Zone.

This brings the paragraph within the second clause of Rule XXI of our rules.

Turn now, Mr. Chairman, to the second paragraph of Rule XXI, and you will find that it does not matter whether this is in precise accordance with existing law or not; but, under that second paragraph of the rule, if it is to carry out an object that is in the paragraph already, it is not subject to a point of order. I will not stop to read the paragraph. The Chair will be able to recall it or look at it if he is not familiar with it. So I insist, under every view of the case, the point of order should be overruled.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLMSTED). The Chair is ready to rule. Against the eighth paragraph the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. RAINEY) invokes, as the Chair understands, the second clause of Rule XXI of this House, which declares—

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

It is urged that this eighth paragraph appropriating for the pay of officers and employees other than skilled and unskilled labor in the service of the government of the Canal Zone, is without authority of law.

By recent resolution of the House the President of the United States was asked to state by what authority of law he has exercised the functions of government in the Panama Canal Zone since the date of the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress, or by what right or authority the executive, legislative, and judicial functions in the Zone have been performed since that date.

Replying to that resolution of inquiry, the President, by message delivered to the House on the 4th of April, 1908, said:

Civil government has been maintained in the Canal Zone under my direction pursuant to the authority conferred by the treaty between the United States and Panama, concluded November 18, 1903, and the acts of Congress approved June 28, 1902; April 28, 1904; March 3, 1905; December 21, 1905; June 30, 1906; March 4, 1907, by which the right to maintain civil government in the Canal Zone was granted to the United States, the duty to maintain it was imposed upon the President, and the means for its maintenance were from year to year expressly and specifically appropriated by Congress.

Now, it would probably be safe for the occupant of the chair in Committee of the Whole to accept the construction of the law as declared by the President, acting presumably under the advice of the chief law officer of the Government. But the gentleman from Illinois calls attention to the second section of the act of April 28, 1904, by virtue of which he claims that upon the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress the power of the President to govern the Zone in the manner indicated ceased. Without stopping to inquire into all the acts of Congress referred to in the President's message, the Chair refers first to the treaty with the Republic of Panama. The second article defines the Canal Zone. The third article reads:

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the Zone mentioned and described in Article II of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in Article II which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.

It is manifest, therefore, that the Zone must be governed by the United States in some way or not governed at all.

The Chair finds an act later than the act of 1904, namely, the act of December 21, 1905, in the third section of which occurs this language:

That the President shall annually, and at such other periods as may be provided, either by law or by his order, require full and complete reports to be made to him by the persons appointed or employed by him in charge of the government of the Canal Zone, the construction of the Isthmian Canal, and the operation of the Panama Railroad—

And so forth.

Now, the Chair calls particular attention to this clause:

The President shall annually cause to be made, by the persons appointed and employed by him in charge of the government of said Canal Zone and the construction of said canal, estimates of expenditures and appropriations, in detail as far as practicable, which estimates shall cover all annual salaries paid to persons employed on said work, excepting laborers and skilled laborers, and shall be submitted to Congress in the manner provided in section 5 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for other purposes."

Here is an act passed in 1905 by the Fifty-ninth Congress, after the expiration of the term of the Fifty-eighth Congress, requiring by reasonable interpretation that the President shall continue to govern the Canal Zone in the manner in which he had governed it, and as pointed out in the act of 1904. In pursuance of that authority the President has, from year to year, caused estimates to be submitted by the proper Department to the House, Congress has each year made appropriations for that specific purpose, and the government of the Zone has continued under that authority.

Mr. RAINEY. May I interrupt the Chair? I think the Chair has failed to catch the point I made. The Chair calls attention to the act of December 21, 1905, authorizing, as the Chair insists, the President to continue the government of the Canal Zone. These officers we are trying to pay now, were they created under the authority of the law of 1904 or were they created by virtue of some subsequent law?

I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this Executive order, issued by the President of the United States April 15, 1907, defines even the judicial districts and who the judicial officers shall be; and certainly there can be nothing in the act of 1905 which provides simply for expending $11,000,000 more on the Canal Zone, authorizing that sort of administration on the Canal Zone. The officers we are now attempting to pay are all created by virtue of Executive orders issued nearly two years after the act of 1905 was passed. This is simply an appropriation act, and appropriation acts are only laws for that particular year. That is so well settled, I am sure, that I need not call the attention of the Chair to the fact. While I am on my feet, I want to call the Chair's attention to the most dangerous precedent the Chair is making. The position taken by the Chair in the outset is this: Because there are no laws, and because Congress did not make laws, and because the President advised Congress in a message that he had the right to legislate, therefore he had that right. The Chair is making a most remarkable decision. I submit that this will be a most dangerous precedent to establish in this House. Certainly I hope such a precedent will not be followed by any Congress in the future. I think I can can say it will not be followed by a Democratic Congress.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to know what right the gentleman has to interpret the ruling of the Chair before it is made?

Mr. RAINEY. The Chair has already intimated that he would hold as I have above indicated, if necessary. I also submit that section 3 of the act of December 21, 1905, confers no authority on the President to enact laws for the Zone. This section reads as follows:

SEC. 3. That the President shall annually and at such other periods as may be provided, either by law or by his order, require full and complete reports to be made to him by the persons appointed or employed by him in charge of the government of the Canal Zone, the construction of the isthmian canal, and the operation of the Panama Railroad, including an itemized account of all moneys received and expended, which said reports shall be by the President transmitted to Congress. The President shall annually cause to be made by the persons appointed and employed by him in charge of the government of the Canal Zone and the construction of said canal estimates of expenditures and appropriations, in detail as far as practicable, which estimates shall cover all annual salaries paid to persons employed on said work, excepting laborers and skilled laborers, and shall be submitted to Congress in the manner provided in section 5 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for other purposes." And no money shall be expended for any of the purposes of constructing and maintaining said isthmian canal, or for any expenses incident thereto, except in accordance with appropriations made by Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. With the permission of the gentleman, the Chair will conclude and rule. When a provision of permanent law is allowed to remain in an appropriation bill and is enacted into law, it is just as binding and effective as though found in any other statute. But the act of December 21, 1905, is not an appropriation act at all. It was not intended to and did not make law for one year only, but was intended to be and is permanent in character. It requires reports to be made "annually" by those appointed by the President to govern the Canal Zone. It shows the contemplation and intention of Congress that the President shall continue the government of the Canal Zone. If there were any doubt upon this point, there would still remain the fact that an appropriation in continuation of appropriations for a Government work or object already in progress requires no previous authority of law, but is excepted out of the rule. Without any hesitation whatever the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. RAINEY. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois appeals from the ruling of the Chair. The question is: Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the decision of the committee?

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RAINEY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 93, noes 44.

Mr. RAINEY. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] will kindly take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided, and tellers reported—ayes 92, noes 50.

So the decision of the Chair stood as the judgment of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Tenth. For material, supplies, equipment, new buildings, and contingent expenses for account of the government of the Canal Zone, the unexpended balances of appropriations for these objects June 30, 1908.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to so much of the paragraph as applies to contingent expenses for the government of the Canal Zone for the same reasons as already given. It is on paragraph 10, on page 171.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WATSON). And for the reasons stated by the previous occupant of the chair, the Chair overrules the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fourteenth. For the construction of the new Panama Railroad, to be disbursed directly under the Isthmian Commission, $1,085,000.

Mr. BURKE. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. On page 170, paragraph 6, there is an item providing for the expenditure of $1,100,000 for the construction of the Panama Railroad, provided that the obligation of the Panama Railroad Company shall first be given to the United States for that amount. Paragraph 14, on page 172, provides an expenditure of $1,085,000 for the construction of the new Panama Railroad. Now, the question I would like to have the chairman answer for my information and that of the committee is: What has the Panama Railroad Company to do with the new Panama Railroad? What is the relation of the United States Government to the new Panama Railroad as compared with that which exists with reference to the old Panama Railroad?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, I will say, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the question of the gentleman, that the relation is exactly identical in both cases. The Government of the United States owns the Panama Railroad Company, and this so-called new Panama Railroad is a relocation of so much of the old Panama Railroad as was made necessary by reason of the overflow of the existing roadway in the overflow of the Gatun dam, and the Pedro Miguel dam. Owing to the costruction of the canal, the greater part of the Panama road, as it has heretofore existed, will be entirely overflowed, and the Commission is now engaged in relocating and reconstructing the road outside of the overflowed lands.

Mr. BURKE. Is the relocation and reconstruction to be done under the new Panama Railroad Company?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is all under the Commission.

Mr. BURKE. But is the new Panama Railroad under the jurisdiction of the board of directors of the old Panama Railroad Company?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it is not. It would not make any difference if it was, because it would all be under the jurisdiction of the United States. The directors of the Panama Railroad Company are all officers of the Government of the United States.

Mr. BURKE. If they are both operated under the same authority, and pertain to the same railroad institution, what is the necessity of two separate appropriations for practically the same amount?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Panama Canal Commission is relocating and reconstructing the Panama Railroad on a new location, for the Panama Railroad Company. In order to keep their accounts in shape, the appropriations are made in such a way that the Panama Canal Commission can go on and expend this money. While it is not directly for the purpose of constructing the canal, it is one of the necessary incidents of the construction, and it does this work at its own expense; that is, out of these appropriations. The expense of operating and maintaining the railroad is paid out of the revenues of the railroad corporation.

Mr. BURKE. That is, the $1,100,000; but what is the second amount, $1,085,000, appropriated for?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is for the purpose of rebuilding the old road in its present location, so far as the new road will follow the line of the old road, and where the new road must depart from the line of the old road by reason of these dams which will flood the old right of way, it is covered by the other appropriation. The one is to build a new road in a new place, to take the place of the old road that was abandoned.

Mr. BURKE. Why, then, the language "construction," instead of "reconstruction," as it should be used in the sixth paragraph?

Mr. MADDEN. At Gatun, where they are building new locks and a dam and creating a lake, the water level will be raised 85 feet above the present surface of the earth, and the railroad is on the present surface of the earth. So, in order to get the railroad away from where it would be buried under water, it is to be placed on a higher level.

Mr. BURKE. I understand that.

Mr. MADDEN. It is simply a relocation of the railroad.

Mr. BURKE. I understand that, but if it pertains to the same enterprise, why are there two separate appropriations for $1,100,000 each made necessary in this bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, I will answer the question again. I hope I will be able to make myself more clear than I apparently did the other time. Ever since the Government of the United States took over the property and commenced the construction of the canal, we have been appropriating for new equipment for the railroad and for double tracking, which was absolutely necessary in connection with the construction of the canal. We have carried appropriations for that work under paragraph 6.

Now, that was for double tracking and increasing the equipment, the track and equipment being owned by the Government of the United States and paid for out of appropriations made by Congress. The maintenance of the track and the equipment has been conducted jointly under an agreement with the railroad company and the Canal Commission.

Now, as we approach the completion of the canal—and it is known that a large part of this track which we have built and operated in connection with the tracks of the Panama Railroad Company will be overflowed—it becomes necessary to relocate the road, and therefore the appropriation for relocation of that part of the road that must be relocated is carried in a separate paragraph, while the appropriation for the additional equipment of the old road is carried in the same paragraph where we have heretofore carried it. In that way we can tell just what the relocation of that part of the road that must be relocated will cost, what the equipment and double tracking costs, and that is the reason for their being kept separate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LAWRENCE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6958. An act to provide for private signals at sea.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 179. Joint resolution amending the joint resolution for the relief of storm sufferers in Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, and Louisiana, approved April 30, 1908.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 29. An act to provide for registration of all cases of tuberculosis in the District of Columbia, for free examination of sputum in suspected cases, and for preventing the spread of tuberculosis in said District.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills and joint resolution:

H. R. 17516. An act to increase the membership of the Philippine Commission by one member, and for other purposes;

H. R. 14789. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the protection of game in Alaska, and for other purposes," approved June 7, 1902; and

H. J. Res. 173. Joint resolution for the relief of the sufferers from the cyclone which occurred in the States of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana on April 24, 1908.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 6958. An act to provide for private signals at sea—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, $27,627,000, the same to be available until expended: Provided, That all expenditures from the appropriation herein made for the Isthmian Canal shall be paid from, or reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States out of, the proceeds of the sale of bonds authorized in section 8 of the said act approved June 28, 1902: Provided further, That the wages and salaries paid upon the Isthmus for skilled and unskilled labor by the Isthmian Canal Commission and the Panama Railroad Company shall not exceed by more than 25 per cent the average wages and salaries paid in the United States for similar labor and service.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the whole of the last proviso in this section. I will reserve the point of order temporarily.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, so that it may be pending, I desire to reserve a point of order against the first proviso.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope I may have the attention of the committee while I state the reasons for the recommendation that has been made in the proviso against which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] has reserved the point of order.

All the members of the Committee on Appropriations that could visit the Isthmus last November for the purpose of examining the estimates for canal expenditures during the ensuing fiscal year did so. We spent a little over a week and devoted every minute of the time while there to an investigation of the conditions and the work that was going on and to the investigation of the estimates and reasons for the estimates for canal expenditure during the year 1909.

It is the unanimous judgment of every man on the committee, and I may say that it is the judgment of the members of the Commission, that the labor cost of the canal, putting it at the minimum, is 75 per cent greater than it ought to be when we include the money value of the privileges they enjoy; that the labor cost of the work we are doing there is at least 75 per cent greater than the labor cost of similar work if done in the United States.

We were also impressed with the fact that, notwithstanding this increased cost, the work is being done under sanitary and health conditions as favorable as work of a similar character would be done in the southern section of our country. So far as the health conditions are concerned, there is no part of the United States where the health of the people is better than in the Canal Zone. There is no city in the United States where the death rate is as low as it is in the Canal Zone.

Now, the investigation we made and the testimony before the committee shows that the increased cost is from 25 per cent—I mean now the cash cost—from 25 to 50 per cent for all skilled and unskilled labor. That does not include the cash value of privileges we give to the canal employees. The wages for clerical services are based upon the standard here in the Executive Departments in Washington, and do not exceed the rate of pay for similar services in the city of Washington by 25 per cent. Now, in addition to the salaries paid to the skilled labor and to the unskilled labor, what do they get?

I want to call your attention to the hearings which we took on our investigation while there, and if gentlemen will turn to page 127, they will find there a complete list of not only the wages paid in Panama, but you will find a comparative list of wages for similar service in the United States, and you also will find a verification of the statement I made a minute ago as to the increased pay received by them down there over what they would receive for similar service here.

In addition to their cash payments for salaries, they receive, if married, quarters free of rent, and in the hearings you will find attached a diagram of all the different types of houses, showing just how many rooms there are, how many bathrooms, and everything else in connection with these various buildings.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask unanimous consent for an extension of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. I consider that the House and the country ought to know what the conditions are in the Canal Zone and the cost of that enterprise. In addition to the cash pay these people receive for their services, they receive, as I said before, a dwelling, and it is no mean, measly little dwelling, but they range in cost from $1,700 to $4,000. The Government of the United States furnishes the house for them with everything except the dishes. In addition to that we frunish fuel free, we furnish them with light, we furnish them with sterilized water free, we furnish ice daily at their door at cost—1 cent a pound—and we also furnish them free medicine and medical attendance at their homes.

We also furnish them their club houses and the Young Men's Christian Association halls, their billiard tables and their literature. We also furnish them with their churches and pay for their preachers. If they are members of a fraternal organizations we furnish them with a lodge room in which to meet, and we take care of it for them. In addition to that the hour men are given thirty days sick leave and the men paid by the month six weeks leave with pay.

In addition to that we pay their expenses to the Isthmus, and if they remain there a year we pay their expenses back to the States, and in addition we sell them what they eat and what they wear at cost, which is from 15 to 20 per cent below what they could obtain the same food or the same provisions or the same clothing for in the States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks the officers in charge of this canal are honest and capable?

Mr. TAWNEY. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] should even imply, by asking the question, that either myself or anyone else who is acquainted with the men in charge of this work would think that they were not honest or not capable.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman said he was there, and I want to know his opinion of this. That is part of the question for this House to consider.

Mr. TAWNEY. I say that I regard the men in charge of this work as being not only absolutely honest, but I regard them as being the most capable men that have yet had charge of that work, and if they are not interfered with I believe that they will complete the work, and complete it far more expeditiously than they otherwise would.

I want to say that when we had the hearings on the estimates for canal expenditures down there, and this question of the labor cost of the canal was brought to the attention of the Commission, there was not one of them who did not admit that the labor cost is from 50 to 75 per cent greater than it should be. When you include all of the privileges which canal employees enjoy, which privileges are paid for by the Government of the United States out of the appropriations made for canal expenses, and add the value of those privileges to the cash they receive for their services, no man can dispute the statement that the labor cost of the canal is at least 75 per cent greater than it should be. Mr. Chairman, it was in the interest of good administration as well as in the interest of economy that the committee made this recommendation.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. DAWSON. Does the gentleman not think that this proposed reduction in the wages of men in Panama would have the effect of depleting the force there?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not. That matter was thoroughly investigated, and every member of the Commission was perfectly satisfied that if it were necessary to-morrow to supply the entire skilled-labor roll, it could be done, because they have almost three applications now on file for every position that they have at their disposal.

Mr. DAWSON. How does the gentleman account for the fact that during the past year out of a skilled force of 2,500 men it was necessary to fill 1,900 vacancies?

Mr. TAWNEY. It was necessary, Mr. Chairman, because of the character of men who went there and the purposes for which they went. At that time, when they were just beginning to employ skilled labor, a great many men went down there purely as a matter of adventure, and because, too, they had their transportation paid. When they got there and satisfied the curiosity that drew them there, they returned to the States again.

But that is not the condition that prevails there now. Men are going there now, not because of their spirit of adventure. They are going there now with full knowledge of the conditions that prevail, and they are going there not only for the purpose of remaining, but are remaining, and are going because of the splendid opportunity afforded to have permanent employment at a much higher rate of pay than they could hope to obtain at home.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to discuss the matter further. I want to say this, that there is nobody responsible for this increased labor cost except the conditions that prevailed when we first went there, and the American citizens and the press of the United States, which demanded that as soon as we got there we should commence to make the dirt fly. It was impossible for the Commission to secure the services of the men necessary to carry on that work at that time because of the general impression throughout this country that that place was a pest hole.

Consequently, in order to meet the unreasonable public demand that was made instantly upon our taking possession of the Canal Zone that the dirt should fly, the Commission was obliged to hold out every possible inducement in order to get men there for the purpose of making the dirt fly, and in that way we have fixed a standard which, if maintained until the completion of the canal, will cost the American people from 25 to 50 per cent more in cash than the labor cost in the construction of the canal would otherwise be.

With this statement, Mr. Chairman, in justification of the recommendation of the committee, I will say that if the gentleman from Illinois makes a point of order against this provision it will go out. If it is not the desire of Congress to fix the standard of wage in the Canal Zone that will enable the Commission to administer these appropriations economically and give to the American people the canal at a reasonable labor cost, the responsibility rests with Congress and not with the Committee on Appropriations nor with the Commission.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota. Are we going to dispose of both these provisos at one time or is this on the last one simply?

Mr. TAWNEY. I was talking on the proviso against which the gentleman from Illinois made the point of order. I had forgotten that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] had made a point of order on the other.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. To discuss the point of order.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois insists on the point of order.

Mr. BOUTELL. Does the Chair care to hear me on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is entirely satisfied on the point of order. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, on the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], I will say that the provision has been carried in all the appropriations and it is in accordance with the law that authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to meet all canal expenditures out of the proceeds of the sale of bonds. This is simply to keep constantly before us and before the administrative departments that these appropriations are not to come out of the general revenues of the Government, but are to be repaid to the Treasury under these statutes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman permit me a question in connection with the other proviso? Is not the question of the relative cost between wages there and here, or rather, in other words, is not the price that the Commission pays for labor entirely within their purview? Is there any law now which fixes the relation between wages here and there?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; there is none.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then what is the necessity for the provision? I could not quite understand why the Commission could not get the labor at any other price.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman one other question. Why do you put in that first proviso?

Mr. TAWNEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I say, Why do you put in the first proviso?

Mr. TAWNEY. The first proviso is put in there because the law expressly provides that the expenditures for the canal shall be paid from the proceeds of the sale of bonds.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If that is so, why do you put it in?

Mr. TAWNEY. Simply because it is the law and because we want to keep constantly before the administrative officers of the Government and the country the fact that these expenditures are not to be charged to the current revenues of the Government.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you have to repeat the statute every time you pass an approvriation bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; we do not have to repeat the statute and we do not do it. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that we carry a very similar provision in the District of Columbia appropriation bill every year, notwithstanding the fact that the law imposes the duty of expending half of the appropriations out of the revenues of the District and the other half out of the Treasury of the United States. Notwithstanding the fact that we carry it every year, there is an attempt made to evade it all the time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why do not you send some of those fellows to jail, if we have a law? Is not the real purpose you want to cover up a deficiency in the revenues?

Mr. TAWNEY. Not at all. There was no occasion last year or the year before to cover up any deficiency, because there was none. This provision has been carried in every appropriation bill that has carried an appropriation for canal expenditures, and it is carried there for the purpose of giving notice to the administrative officers of the Government and to Congress itself that these expenditures must and can only be paid from the proceeds of the sale of bonds.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. There is no negro there.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand that the law is similar to the provision in this bill. My understanding of the proposition is that the gentleman is attempting to change the law. The law authorizes the sale or borrowing of money on certain bonds in order to carry out this work, and in that case it authorizes the use of the money for that purpose. Now, under the provisions of this bill the gentleman is attempting to use money out of the Treasury for this purpose and then carry the provision in the bill so, if they think it necessary hereafter, they can take the money from the sale of bonds and apply it to this purpose. Now, my objection to this paragraph is this: We are facing an election. The gentlemen on this committee, as they have always done whenever they have to face a Presidential election, get ready to pretend to the country that they are economizing. They immediately go to bookkeeping, and we have in some sessions of Congress popgun deficiency appropriation bills, so that they will not all appear in one bill.

At another time facing a Presidential election we carry small appropriations that the committee well know will not be enough to carry on the Government for another year and then expect, when the short session comes, to supplement them in a deficiency bill for the purpose of appearing to the country that they are economizing. Well, now, it looks to me very much like this provision was put in here for the purpose of substituting and transferring these accounts.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that in view of the votes on both sides of the House to increase appropriations reported from the Committee on Appropriations, there is no fear at all about the country having any misinformation or wrong impression regarding the responsibility for increasing expenditures at this session of Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, yes; I am well aware how the gentleman votes to increase appropriations. The gentleman votes to increase appropriations and increases them in these bills, and I notice the increases in appropriations usually go where the benefit falls to special interests.

Some gentlemen on this side have recently, and I suppose that is what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] refers to, voted to increase appropriations in questions that were close to the people of the United States, namely, for the gauging of streams, for the investigation of explosions in coal mines, to save life and limb, for cyclone sufferers——

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman is not talking to his point of order, and we want to finish the bill to-night.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. For that class of appropriations we are in favor of the increase.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WATSON in the chair). The Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the Chair will permit reference to the act, which, I think, will make some difference.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is perfectly willing to hear the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Chair will not sustain the point of order when I show that this is clearly in order under existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustained the point of order made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was not discussing the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I raise this point of order, Mr. Chairman, that you can not have two points of order pending at the same time, and the gentleman from Alabama had a point of order pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama was supposed to be discussing the point of order, but he was not, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] made the point of order that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was not discussing the point of order, which the Chair has sustained. There is nothing before the House to decide now but the point of order offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], if he presses it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The point of order I made was that this was not existing law and it was an attempt to enact legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on the point of order?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman refers to the act of June 28, 1902, which provides:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States from time to time as the proceeds may be required to defray expenditures by this act—

And so forth, authorizing the borrowing of the money, up to $130,000,000, for the purpose of constructing the canal. Now, I wish to say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that I am not disposed to conceal any appropriations that may be made by the committee. If there is political advantage to be gained from the publication, I heartily favor the publicity. I have endeavored to emphasize the extravagance of this Administration. The object of the reimbursement of these canal expenditures, however, is to spread over a period of years the expenditures for a great public improvement, as is done in every civilized community on the face of the earth. Instead of paying for the construction of the canal out of the current revenues of the Government, it should be paid out of the proceeds of bonds spread over a period. Now, the act of February 27——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will my colleague from New York——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to read a later law. In the act of February 27, 1906, there is this provision:

Provided, That all expenditures from the appropriation herein and hereinafter made for the Isthmian Canal shall be paid from or reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States out of the proceeds of the sale of bonds authorized in section 8 of the act approved June 28, 1902.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That was from an appropriation bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But this refers to appropriations not only made "herein," but "hereinafter." The language of the act is "hereinafter made." So that appropriations made at this time or at any time after the 27th of February, 1906, must be reimbursed out of the proceeds of the sale.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does it say "hereinafter" or "hereafter?"

Mr. FITZGERALD. It says, "From the appropriations herein and hereinafter made."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, that applies to that bill, of course.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; it does not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. You would say "hereafter" if it meant some other bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As to whether it would apply to that bill alone or some other bill there might, of course, be a difference of opinion. I know that the intention was at that time to stop the practice that then prevailed of paying the greater part of the appropriations for the canal from the current revenues of the Government. It was never contemplated that the current revenues of the Government should be utilized to defray the expense of constructing the Panama Canal. It was contemplated and it was intended that the cost should be defrayed by bond issues, so that the expense would be spread over a period of at least thirty years. The object of this act of February 27, 1906, was to so amend the original law that the Treasury Department, or the Secretary of the Treasury, or the President would not be able to utilize the current revenues for this purpose, but that whatever money was taken from current revenues should be replaced by the proceeds of bond issues for this specific purpose.

Mr. TAWNEY. In addition to what my colleague on the committee has said, there is only one other question that the Chair would be concerned to know, and that is whether or not the appropriations thus far made are within the limitations of the act of June 28, 1902. In that the limit is $130,000,000, and we are yet within that limitation. We have appropriated $17,000,000 less than the maximum limit of cost.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the Chair's attention to the fact that the law referred to by the gentleman from New York does not provide "that hereafter all sums" shall be treated in this manner, but it says "hereinafter," merely referring to sums carried in the appropriation bill on which that law was enacted and not applying to other independent appropriation bills.

Now, as to the question of the limitation of amount. This proviso does not act, and is not intended to act as a limitation upon the appropriation that is made. I do not raise any question that Congress has the right to appropriate money to build this canal. It is a question of building it, and paying it out of the Federal Treasury, taking another sum that it has provided, maybe raised for this purpose, and paying it back into the Treasury. That is the proposition—that hereafter reimbursement may be made to the Treasury from another sum that he has authority to borrow.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the proviso against which the point of order is made is subject to the point of order. There is evidently an attempt made by the Committee on Appropriations, as the Chair gathers, to repeat existing law. But the committee has not repeated the existing law.

Mr. TAWNEY. On what ground does the Chair think that there is an attempt to repeal existing law?

The CHAIRMAN. Restate, not repeal; restate existing law. The gentleman from Minnesota said that it was the law, and that he wanted the country to know and the attention of the country called to it from time to time. The gentleman from New York stated that it was a repetition of the existing law; but it does not repeat the existing law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not state that. I said it was in compliance with the act of February 27, 1906, which provides for the reimbursement.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the necessity for this provision grows out of the fact that the act of June 28, 1902, contains a provision which reads:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to borrow upon the credit of the United States from time to time as the proceeds may be required to defray the expenses authorized by this act.

Now, that is the canal act. It did not necessarily say what particular expenditures herein appropriated for shall be reimbursed under the provision, or that the Treasury shall be reimbursed for the expenditure made under this specific appropriation. It says that he may borrow money from time to time for the construction of this work and carrying out the provisions of this act. Now, it is under this act that we make appropriations, and we are authorized to make appropriations, and we identify this appropriation in the expenditure of the money he is authorized to borrow and pay out. That is the only reason for carrying it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the reason. Is it or is it not the contention that the act quoted is sufficient to authorize or is not sufficient to authorize the expenditure that is made here or the reimbursement?

Mr. TAWNEY. The act authorizes Congress to make appropriations for the construction of the canal. But the act does not identify these expenditures now authorized by the appropriations in this bill; and it is for that reason that we carry this proviso, in order to identify these expenditures, for which the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow money to meet. It has been carried in every appropriation for the same reason ever since we commenced work on the canal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that, but that does not bring it within the rule. The Chair thinks it is an attempt by the Committee on Appropriations to supplement legislation which the gentleman has quoted, and in the opinion of the Chair that is clearly legislation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It simply declares what the law is, not legislation, in the act of February 27, 1906.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that if it seeks to declare what existing law is, it must do it verbatim, but it does not do it verbatim. The gentleman from New York himself has read showing the discrepancy, and differentiating as to what is repeated in the appropriation bill. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Insert:
"Provided, That no part of the funds herein appropriated shall be expended for the payment of wages or salaries to skilled or unskilled laborers for services rendered or performed upon the Isthmian Canal and the Panama Railroad in excess of 25 per cent above the average of wages and salaries paid in the United States for similar labor or services."

Mr. BOUTELL. I make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. MACON. Wait until we fix the place where it is to come in. I desire it to come in after the word "expended," in line 6, page 172. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order for a moment?

Mr. BOUTELL. I will reserve it for a moment.

Mr. MACON. I desire to be heard on the point of order. The chairman of the Appropriations Committee has ably discussed the merits of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is evidently a limitation upon this appropriation and nothing else. It simply provides that none of the money herein appropriated shall be expended in the payment of wages or salaries to skilled or unskilled laborers for services rendered or performed upon the Isthmian Canal or upon the Panama Railroad in excess of 25 per cent above the average amount that is paid for similar services in the United States.

Mr. DAWSON. Can the gentleman tell the House how the average wages in the United States in any trade or occupation could be definitely ascertained?

Mr. MACON. I will answer that in language that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has just furnished me, by saying that the Census Bureau figures it out exactly, so it can be easily determined what the average wages are for similar services in the United States, and all anyone will have to do will be to refer to the calculations made by that department. In other words, in the language used by the gentleman from New Jersey a few days ago when some one wanted to make a calculation upon the floor on the monetary question, he stated that it would not be necessary for anyone else to make the calculation, because he had already made it for them.

The Census Bureau having already made the calculation the parties charged with the duty of the payment of these salaries on the Isthmian Canal will not have to make the calculation at all. It has already been made for them.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In what bulletin does the gentleman find that information? I have never been able to get it myself, but I am very glad that the gentleman knows where that information is to be found.

Mr. MACON. I said the Census Bureau.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In what bulletin issued by the Census Bureau?

Mr. MACON. I do not know the number or the name.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is the gentleman quite certain that the Bureau has that information?

Mr. MACON. I stated it on the authority of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], a member of the committee that brought this contested provision into the House in the first instance.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MACON. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Has not the gentleman from Maine made many speeches in which he compared the rate of American wages with the rate of wages paid in other countries?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No, sir. The gentleman from Maine never made that kind of a speech, comparing them generally, because he never was able to get the information from any Government publication.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The gentleman has heard that sort of talk, has he not?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But the gentleman from Maine has not done it. You will have to hunt up some other gentleman.

Mr. MACON. The Chair will not be troubled with that side of the question in rendering his decision on the point of order. That trouble will belong to some one else, and the Chair has only to say whether or not this is a limitation upon the expenditure of this money. The Chair is not concerned or troubled about the question as to who shall make the calculation, where it shall be made, or when it shall be made.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, without entering into any discussion as to whether this amendment conforms to the general form of an amendment by way of limitation, I wish to call the Chair's attention to this fundamental principle, that no amendment by way of limitation can be in order unless the limitation works itself automatically. A limitation may be placed on an appropriation limiting the expenditure of the money by express terms, but there can not be a proper limitation under our decisions whereby some officer has to make some calculation, or do something before the limitation becomes operative or becomes alive; it must show upon the face of it what the limitation is, and in perfectly definite terms.

The second ground for objection to this amendment is that it is entirely void for uncertainty. It is void for the same uncertainty for which a court will throw out an instrument. We are the lawmakers, and the burden of making intelligible provisions of law is upon us, and it is a burden which we ought not to shift upon the courts. It would be utterly impossible under this amendment for anyone connected with the Panama Canal Commission to tell what the limitation would be. There are no express terms as to time, and there are no express terms as to how the average wages are to be calculated.

No court could construe the language of that amendment intelligently. There is not sufficient basis for anyone to work out what may be generally intended by the limitation, and for these two reasons, without entering upon the discussion as to whether it is in the general form of a limitation, first, because the limitation does not work automatically; and second, because whatever work would have to be done is too vaguely described, I insist that the point of order must be sustained.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, as to the time, I will state it is limited by the life of the appropriation, the life of the money appropriated in this bill, which is one year, and it could not go beyond that.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the point I desire to make is that largely made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL]. When I first noticed this provision of the appropriation bill, it occurred to me it would be extremely difficult to enforce it and to know what Congress meant by it. I made a little investigation on my own account. I found that the Isthmian Canal authorities are familiar with the language of the appropriation, and, as far as I was able to ascertain from them, they did not know what Congress meant by this. We all know, men who are familiar with wages, that in the large cities throughout this country the wages are in excess of 50 per cent higher than the average wage throughout the country. Who is going to determine whether these high wages should enter into the general average or whether they should be included or not? In other words, how is anybody going to put into effect this limitation? In my judgment this amendment is abolutely subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it is not the duty of the Chair, in deciding whether or not a proposed amendment is within the rule of limitation, to decide whether or not it is practical or otherwise. As to whether or not the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas imposes an impossible task, it is for the House to decide and not for the Chair. The Chair thinks that the language of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas is one of limitation within the meaning of that term, and well defined by previous decisions for many years past, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the merits. I did not make my point of order simply because I considered this amendment technically subject to a point of order, nor to make this bill artistic and perfect in form. I am willing to leave that to the able and capable chairman of the committee in charge of the bill [Mr. TAWNEY]. I made the point of order against it because I do not think it ought to be in the bill. If it is not subject to a point of order, it ought to be rejected by this committee.

This amendment, like the amendment that went out on the point of order that I made before, seeks to tie the hands of the Isthmian Canal Commission in the employment of labor, skilled and unskilled, by limiting in vague terms—terms too vague to be carried out—the maximum rate of wages. We want this canal built as cheaply as possible, of course. But we want the canal built, and the building of the canal and the speedy construction of the canal are of much more importance to the people of the United States than that the canal should be built cheaply.

Another thing, in building this canal as cheaply as possible can we not very well leave to the administrative officers, whom we trust in all other matters and in all other disbursements, the expenditure for wages? Can we not leave to these officials, skilled and experienced men, the matter of determining what wages are necessary to secure capable men and keep the work up to the highest possible rate of progress?

This great work, the greatest work of this or any of the centuries of modern times, is being carried on under power vested by Congress in the President of the United States, and through him in the Canal Commission, in the executive and administrative officers of the Government, and I insist that we may well trust them in determining what wages shall be paid. I am quite ready to concede that we are paying 75 per cent more for skilled and unskilled labor on the canal than we are paying in some parts of the United States. I will not argue that proposition. It may be that we are giving them superior comforts and superior necessities and luxuries over and above what men in similar ranks of life get anywhere else in this country. All this may be true, but it still remains, Mr. Chairman, that it is difficult to get skilled and unskilled labor to go and remain on the Isthmus.

I have talked with many men who have been down there, and I think I know the reason. We may give them better houses than they have here. We may give them bath houses and ice and distilled water and club rooms and halls, but the thing that oppresses the men on the Canal Zone, as the universal testimony will show, is the sense of isolation, the sense of distance from home. It is the same homesickness or nostalgia that kills men in the Army when they are in foreign lands. I want to impress upon you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that the workman who goes down there with his pick or shovel, notwithstanding his house and ice and filtered water, soon develops an intense longing for home; and as he goes about in the fine houses and partakes of his ice and his filtered water, and although he appreciates his bath house and club room, he is humming to himself:

'Mid pleasures and palaces though he may roam,
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home.

[Applause.]

That is the trouble in getting American workmen to go down there on the Isthmus of Panama and stay there and do their work well, and if it takes 50 per cent more than it takes to do the same work in Minnesota or Tennessee or Illinois, or if it takes 75 per cent more to get good men there and keep them—nay, Mr. Chairman, if it takes a hundred per cent more—let us leave the fixing of the necessary wage to the administrative officers, and not tie their hands and cripple them in getting the labor that they need. We may trust them not to pay more than they need, but we must trust them to get all the labor they need, even if they pay this increase over and above the amount that is paid here at home, and I hope that this amendment will be rejected by the unanimous vote of this committee. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some one give us some figures and facts about what the wages are down there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I think I can give the gentleman from Tennessee some facts. As near as the Isthmian Canal Commission authorities have been able to determine, the average daily wages in the Isthmian Canal Commission now for the class of men contemplated by this amendment is $5 a day. The amendment now before the committee, if adopted, consequently will result in a reduction of the wages of the men on the canal to the extent of from 25 to 50 per cent. So that is the proposition that confronts us now. The Commission employs on the Isthmus men divided roughly into two classes, those paid by the month or year and the hourly men, and this amendment will affect only the hourly men. It is true that we are paying, say, from 25 to 50 per cent more than perhaps the average throughout the country, but it is not true that we are paying from 25 to 50 per cent more than is being paid in the city of New York and the other great cities of the country to-day; and, as I said a moment ago, this proposition merely means that the United States Government shall be put in the position of being the first employer of labor to yield to the pressure on all sides to cut wages because of the panic which we have just experienced. This is a proposition to force the United States Government to utilize the fact that men are out of employment all over this country and are clamoring at the doors of the Isthmian Canal Commission for work, and to ask the Government to take advantage of their needs and necessities and employ them at a cheaper rate of wages than they were able to get them for before the panic.

Mr. MACON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I can not yield. I have only five minutes, and if my time is extended, then I will answer your question. The men that are affected by this proposition are the men who are engaged in making the dirt fly, the men who are doing the work; the big, brawny, strong, muscular men of this country, the men whom the Isthmian Canal Commission last summer were taking into the service as fast as they came—fairly eating them up, as any Member of Congress can testify. Why, there was not any difficulty for me, a Democratic Member of Congress, having no influence with the Administration, to get men placed, for they were taking practically all the skilled mechanics that came there. Now conditions have changed. The panic is here. In the months of October and November I sent hundreds of men to New York to the office of the Commission, not one of whom could obtain employment.

But the names of these men were put on a list and kept. These poor fellows are out of work now, by no fault of their own, perhaps by the fault of this Administration, and the desire now is to use them as a club to beat down the price of the men we have taken to the Isthmus in good faith, and whom we promised wages which were only fair under the circumstances when we employed them. Gentlemen, what does it mean if this proposition is permitted to go into the law? It means there will be labor troubles on the Isthmus. It means that these men you have sent down there will be subject to laws they are not subject to here. It means that these men, now governed by Executive order, who have not the protection you and I have, are to be involved in labor disputes and trouble. The Secretary of War has something to say about these matters on the Isthmian Canal, and we all know the facility with which he can issue injunctions in labor troubles.

I say to you, gentlemen, that it would be unfair and improper for any man who pretends to have the interest of the laboring men of this country at heart to vote for this proposition. These men went down there in absolute good faith; they went down there for not one penny more than they were able to earn or that they were entitled to at that particular time. The conditions have changed, but the men are still the same, the best mechanics that this country could produce. I myself have advised hundreds of young fellows, skilled men, the best of their class, to go down there and rely on the fairness and honesty of the Government of the United States; to go there and do their work and get promoted; to get a reputation for themselves and come back better than when they went down there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas who offered the amendment, I suppose, is entitled to close the debate, but I want to move to close debate in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate close in ten minutes.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, before that is put, I desire to have ten minutes——

Mr. TAWNEY. Then I move to close debate in fifteen minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not move to close debate in so short a time because this is one of the most important questions involved in the construction of the Panama Canal.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to close all debate in fifteen minutes.

Mr. SULZER. I shall object unless I can have five minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. It does not make any difference if the gentleman does object.

Mr. SULZER. I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that thirty minutes be substituted for fifteen.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to amend by striking out "fifteen" and inserting "thirty."

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. CLARK of Missouri) there were—ayes 70, noes 76.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided, and the tellers (Mr. TAWNEY and Mr. CLARK of Missouri) reported that there were—ayes 81, noes 97.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to substitute "twenty-five" for "fifteen."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that is dilatory——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; it is not dilatory.

Mr. TAWNEY. It will have that effect.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will compromise with the gentleman on twenty minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, I will compromise with the gentleman from Missouri on twenty minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the time for debate will be limited to twenty minutes. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I would like to know what happened to me in the Missouri compromise.

The CHAIRMAN. It appears to the Chair that the gentleman from New Jersey was lost in the shuffle. The Chair desires to know whether any person in the affirmative desires to be heard?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand it, I had pending when the motion was made by the gentleman from Minnesota a request that I be permitted to proceed for five minutes. I understood the gentleman from Minnesota included my proposition in his motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that he had made that kind of a request, but that was before the time had been limited. The limiting of time so changes conditions in the Committee of the Whole that the Chair does not believe the original condition should be recognized. The Chair therefore recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON]. If no other person desires to speak in the affirmative or negative of the proposition, the gentleman might afterwards get more time.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that no argument ought to be necessary in behalf of this amendment after what was stated by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in support of the proposition. Why, sir, I can not understand how anybody could want any more favored conditions for the laborers, whether they be skilled or unskilled, in the Panama Zone than that they be paid a wage of 25 cents in excess of the amount that is paid to wage-earners in this country, when they are, in addition to that, given houses in which to live—houses that cost not less than $1,700, and some of them as much as $4,000; when they are given their lights free of charge; when they are given sterilized water free of charge and their ice at cost; when they, Mr. Chairman, are given their clubhouses, their billiard tables, their lodge rooms, together with many other comforts and pleasures that the laborers of the United States do not enjoy at the hands of their Government.

Gentlemen have said, Mr. Chairman, that if this limitation is placed upon the wages of these employees on the canal, it will discourage laborers and that they will not go there. I am advised, sir, that to-day there are several hundred applications for almost every position within the gift of the Panama Canal Commission. I am advised that men are fairly clamoring for these positions, and they will continue to clamor if the price is fixed at 25 per cent in excess of the amount that is paid to laborers in this country for similar services.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MACON. Just a question.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks it is proper, because there are so many men out of work and clamoring for work, to lower the wages and compel them, because of their necessities, to accept less wages?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, to limit the price that is paid labor on the Panama Canal according to the terms of this amendment will not put a single laborer out of a job anywhere in the United States or anywhere within the jurisdiction of the United States. There are men, as I said a moment ago, who are clamoring for these places now, men who are ready to take the positions as soon as they are vacated by those who now hold them. They are considered such favored positions that several hundred applicants are now anxious for each and every one of them. I heard a gentleman a while ago upon this side—I will not call his name—say, when I offered this amendment, that we had the Republicans in a hole up to the time I offered it, because they had offered it in the bill when they brought it in. As a Democrat who loves the principles of his party to the core, I will plainly state that I am not here to play politics, and God forbid that I should live to reach a point when I will be mean enough or small enough to sacrifice the money of the people of this country in order that I might give my party some political advantage. I am here, sir, to represent the whole people. I stand for principle rather than for political spoils. I stand for the cause of the common people from one end of this country to the other, and am not trying to advance the cause of my party, by my vote here upon various questions, at their expense. I will not stultify my honor and my integrity that way, let come what will. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Chair will state to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] that he understands the chairman of the committee [Mr. TAWNEY] wants to take the same side that he has taken, and wants to close the debate.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition, as I am opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has agreed to recognize the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DAWSON] now against the amendment.

Mr. SULZER. Then, I ask to be recognized against it.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, aside from the important question involved in this amendment with relation to hampering the work on the canal, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this amendment is absolutely unworkable, that it can not be put into operation, and that it is incapable of administration.

Mr. MACON. May I ask the gentleman if it will not fail, then, if that is the case? You can adopt it, if you want to, and it will fail because it is inoperative?

Mr. DAWSON. That would be a confession of our own incompetency. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], by way of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON], has pointed out that the average wages paid in the United States could be based on the census figures. They have not told us whether these census figures are obtained once a year, or once in five years, or once in ten years. If they are obtained once in five years, of what value are they for basing the wages of workingmen anywhere? But those of us who are familiar with the situation at the navy-yards and the arsenals of the United States happen to know that a principle similar to this governs the wages which are paid at navy-yards and arsenals.

Under regulations of the Department the wages at these institutions are based upon the average wage paid to men in similar occupations residing in the vicinity; and the Department prescribes a limited vicinity which shall be taken into account in fixing the wages at the various arsenals and navy-yards. As everyone knows, there is frequent controversy between the wage board and the men on the question of the average wages paid in those limited vicinities, and it is a task of great difficulty to ascertain these facts correctly in an area of only limited radius. That being so at every navy-yard and arsenal in the United States with respect to a limited vicinity, I would like to have some one tell me how one Department can determine the average wages and salaries paid throughout the entire United States. If the wages of these men on the Panama Canal are based upon the average wages paid in the United States, the average should be determined accurately; and with the experience we have had in limited vicinities, I say it would be impossible to ascertain correctly the average wages paid throughout the entire United States.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who fixes these wages?

Mr. DAWSON. There is a wage board.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who controls the wage board?

Mr. DAWSON. The wage board at navy-yards is composed of officers of the Navy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is not Secretary Taft behind it?

Mr. DAWSON. The Secretary of the Navy has a reviewing authority of the wage board at each navy-yard.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to know who fixes the wages on the Canal Zone?

Mr. DAWSON. The Panama Canal Commission.

Mr. SULZER. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MACON. I can rise to ask a question, can I not?

Mr. SULZER. But I have the floor. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that there have already been three speeches made against this amendment—five-minute speeches—and only one speech in favor of it. There are ten minutes remaining yet, which would only give two speeches of five minutes in favor of the amendment, against three speeches made against it. I would like that order to be adopted.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I have the floor. All I want to say is just a word or two, and then I want to yield the balance of my time to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON]. In my judgment, the adoption of this proposed amendment will be a great mistake. It will be a step backward. It will hamper the work on the canal; it will be a stumbling block; it will strike a blow at the progress the Secretary of War is making with the work at the present time.

I am a friend of the toilers on the Panama Canal, and I shall never vote to curtail their pay. Their lot is hard enough now. This proposed amendment is most unwise and should be defeated. I want to see it overwhelmingly defeated in the interest of fair play and living wages; in the interest of the speedy building of the canal; in the interest of justice to all concerned; in the interest of American honor; in the interest of the American workman. If we want good work done on the canal we must pay good wages. If this amendment should be adopted it will be a penny wise and a pound foolish policy. I now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, like the gentleman from Arkansas, I have no desire to play politics in connection with this proposition; but I have a desire to see that fair play is extended to those who earn their bread in the sweat of their faces on the Isthmian Canal. [Applause.] This is a proposition that workmen down there shall not be paid more than 25 per cent in excess of the average wages paid in the United States. Is there any gentleman on the floor of the House who can tell what the average wage in the United States is at the present time? It would require the taking of a census of the wages paid for skilled and unskilled labor in order to determine what the average is, and what wage should be paid on the Isthmus.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will yield, I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that this is done every year by the Navy Department in the navy-yards, and it is also being done by the Bureau of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. And the figures obtained by the Navy Department and those obtained by the Bureau of Commerce and Labor are widely apart. They are never together. So that it is impossible to get exact figures. The average wage, if you did obtain it and did pay it to the men who are working down there, would amount to a less rate than the maximum rate paid in the United States for similar classes of labor. There is not a large industrial center in the United States, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, where the wage rate paid for skilled mechanics and unskilled workmen is not more than 25 per cent higher than the average rate paid for similar labor in the United States; and if you insist upon a proposition of this kind, then it means that the workmen down there will be required to work for less wages than they could receive in the cities on the mainland itself.

So it means a reduction of wages to the men who went down there in good faith. They were induced to believe that they would get good wages, and they gave up their positions and went there. If you pass this provision, it will amount to a reduction of wages, and if they are driven out of employment, after having induced them to go there, when they come back they may not be able to find employment again. I protest against this unjust condition of affairs. It will work injustice upon the men who were induced to go to work upon the Panama Canal. Those men went down there because they believed they could better their condition. Men do not leave their homes and accept employment elsewhere unless you make an inducement for them to do so; and if we are to secure the necessary workmen to continue the work on the Panama Canal, it is absolutely necessary that the wages should be in excess of the wages paid here, that the conditions under which they labor should be better than the conditions here. If the conditions are not better than they are at home, then there could be only one impulse that would take them down there, and that would be the impulse of patriotism. Workingmen are like others, they are not prone to yield to the impulse of patriotism when others are not inspired by that impulse. [Applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not intend to discuss this proposition any further than I discussed it a few moments ago when the point of order was made by the gentleman from Illinois. I stated then what is simply the fact, as proven by the testimony contained in the hearings on the estimates, on the Isthmus of Panama.

This is not a political question. The construction of the Panama Canal is not a political question. We are called upon to appropriate the money of the people for the construction of that canal. I simply want to say that if any man, I care not who he is, can justify appropriating 75 per cent more for that work than is actually necessary, then, of course, I will vote against this amendment.

The gentleman from Tennessee asked a moment ago what the wages were that were paid. The wages for a blacksmith are 65 cents an hour, gold. For a boilermaker, 65 cents an hour. In the United States the general average is 30 cents an hour. That average is one which has been ascertained by the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman state again the hourly wages of a blacksmith on the Zone and here at home?

Mr. TAWNEY. Sixty-five cents an hour there and 30 cents an hour here.

Mr. BOUTELL. Who fixes the wages of the men employed on the Canal Zone?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Commission.

Mr. BOUTELL. Can we not trust them to fix the wages, just as they fix the price of material?

Mr. TAWNEY. I stated some time ago why it was that we were paying so much more than anybody else was paying for similar services, and that was due to the conditions down there when we first took control there, before the Isthmus was placed in a sanitary condition. In order to meet that condition every inducement was held out to get men to go down there. Now, these conditions have been changed, and the Commission themselves admit that the wages are higher than they ought to be. In the hearings they recommend the very provision which we are discussing, and they recommend it not only in the interest of economy but in the interest of good administration.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does Secretary Taft approve this proposition?

Mr. TAWNEY. The proposition was not submitted to Secretary Taft.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Secretary Taft stated to me here on this floor that if that limitation was left in the bill, he was afraid that it would cripple his work on the Canal Zone.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know what Secretary Taft said to you.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. He said that to me.

Mr. TAWNEY. I know what the hearings disclosed in respect to the opinion of the Commission itself in regard to this provision. It was for the purpose of laying these facts before the House and letting the House take the responsibility of the increased cost of the canal that the committee saw fit to report the provision it has.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Did Colonel Goethals say anything about it?

Mr. TAWNEY. Colonel Goethal's testimony is here to that effect.

Mr. DAWSON. Have not the Commission the power to reduce the wages without this provision, if they think it best?

Mr. TAWNEY. They have the power to reduce the wages if the power above them would acquiesce in it.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Why is it that this proposition only applies to the hourly laborers, the men who do the work, and not to the officers?

Mr. TAWNEY. It does not apply alone to the hourly men.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. In the opinion of the Canal Commission it would apply only to the hourly men.

Mr. TAWNEY. It does not apply to the hourly men. It applies to the skilled and unskilled men.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. They are nearly all hourly men.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, no.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. With the exception of train men, they are hourly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, no; they are not.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. With the exception of railroad men and train men, and a few others?

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, no; a great many men who are called skilled laborers are paid by the month.

Let me give you another illustration, and with the permission of the committee, I want to insert in the RECORD two of these tables.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time for debate on this amendment has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, let us have the amendment read again.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, have I consent to extend my remarks by printing the two tables contained in the hearings which I have referred to?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the tables that he referred to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not want to object to the gentleman extending his remarks if they are on this subject.

Mr. TAWNEY. I simply want consent to print two tables that I have alluded to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

STATEMENT SHOWING COMPENSATION PAID BY THE ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION TO EMPLOYEES ON THE ISTHMUS, AND ALSO THE COMPENSATION IN THE UNITED STATES, AT THE TIMES DESIGNATED, IN CERTAIN TYPICAL POSITIONS, AND THE PERCENTAGE OF INCREASE OF THE ISTHMIAN RATES OVER THE GIVEN UNITED STATES RATES.

TABLE A.—Isthmian Canal Commission rate and the general average compensation throughout the United States, as shown by the statistics of the Bureau of Labor as of December, 1905. For the purposes of this comparison 10 per cent is added to the latter rate, as it is understood that since the time stated there has been such advance in the compensation of these positions.

TABLE B.—Isthmian Canal Commission rate and the general average compensation throughout the United States, as compiled by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the year ending June 30, 1905, with 10 per cent increase added to the latter rates. The compilation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, from which such average compensations are taken, bases the calculations on the total payments made to a given class of employees and divides that sum by the number of days' service of all such employees during the period. Thus, the average given does not contemplate the actual number of employees rendering the service, but it is stated that such average is the most satisfactory and more nearly accurate for comparative purposes which may be obtained.

NOTE.—All employees of the Isthmian Canal Commission are also given free (1) furnished quarters, (2) hospital and medical attendance, (3) fuel and light, (4) after six months' service furnished family quarters, if available, (5) thirty days' injury leave, with pay, in case of accident, and (a) hourly employees are paid for a full working day of eight hours on legal holidays, as well as time and a half for overtime, the latter being paid on holidays additional; (b) monthly employees are granted six weeks' leave of absence, with pay, and entitled to an additional thirty days' sick leave in case of illness in each year's service, and (c) hourly employees will soon be granted the additional thirty days' sick leave in case of illness, which now obtains for monthly employees.

For the above sixteen positions the average percentage of increase of the Isthmian flat-wage rate is 64 per cent.

The following comparisons, Tables D, E, and F, are made after reducing the allowances to employees on the Isthmus for furnished quarters, fuel, light, etc., as enumerated in the note under Table C, to a money basis, which for the purposes of comparison may be estimated at 20 per cent of their wage. In the past the Commission has allowed a commutation of 15 per cent of an employee's salary in lieu of quarters, when the same were not available. The 20 per cent mentioned does not include the annual, sick, or injury leave which employees receive with pay under certain conditions.

TABLE D (based on Table A).—Isthmian Canal Commission rate and the general compensation throughout the United States, as shown by the statistics of the Bureau of Labor as of December, 1905, with 10 per cent added to the latter rate for increase in wages since 1905, and 20 per cent added to the Isthmian Canal Commission rate for furnished quarters, fuel, light, etc., given employees, as explained above.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and Mr. MACON demanded a division.

The House divided, and the Chair announced that seven gentlemen had arisen in the affirmative.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the request for a division.

Mr. BOUTELL. The other side.

Mr. MACON. I have withdrawn my request for a division.

Mr. BOUTELL. I renew the demand for a division.

The committee again divided, and the Chairman reported that there were—ayes 10, noes 101.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Insert on page 172, line 6, after the word "expended," the following:

"Provided, That all expenditures from the appropriation herein and hereinafter made for the Isthmian Canal shall be paid from and reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States out of the proceeds of the sale of the bonds authorized in section 8 of the act approved June 28, 1902."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to accomplish what evidently has been the intention of Congress from the outset—that is, to provide that the expense of building the canal shall not be paid from current revenues of the Government, but that the expense shall be spread over a considerable period and paid from bond issues. I hope the amendment shall be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. The foregoing appropriations shall be available to reimburse the Panama Railroad Company for marine losses, or for losses due to destruction of or damage to its plant, equipment, or commissary supplies by fire: Provided, however, That upon this appropriation becoming effective the Panama Railroad Company shall cease to carry insurance against loss from causes covered by this appropriation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is the object of that proviso?

Mr. TAWNEY. The object of that whole paragraph is to avoid the payment of between $40,000 and $50,000 in premiums to insurance companies for insurance upon property of the Panama Railroad Company. This insurance is on buildings of various kinds and other property in the city of Colon and Panama.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the Government insure any of its other property?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Government does not carry insurance on any of its property in the Canal Zone or anywhere else. The Government has always carried its own insurance. The property on which this insurance is carried belongs to the Government. The commissary supplies and buildings belong to the Panama Railroad Company in name while in fact it belongs to the United States.

If the storehouses owned and used by the Panama Railroad Company should take fire and be destroyed with all of their contents, and the company did not or could not be reimbursed by the Commission on account of the loss, the consequences would be most serious, indeed. The Commission would be unable to supply the employees and would be otherwise seriously embarrassed in carrying on the work. Without the insurance there would be no way whereby the railroad company would have the means to purchase a new stock of supplies. If this provision is adopted the Commission, out of its appropriations, could furnish the money with which to purchase a new stock of supplies.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The theory on which the Government does not take out insurance is that its property is so greatly diffused that it is cheaper to carry its own risk than to pay the insurance companies to insure it?

Mr. GARRETT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. This says "marine losses."

Mr. TAWNEY. That means all the supplies, all of the property; they run the steamship line between Colon and New York.

Mr. GARRETT. The Panama Railroad Company and the steamship line are really owned by the Government; it is the Government's steamship?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. Now, where they carry freight for private parties, and that is lost, or if it should be lost, does this cover that?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; the shipper would have to carry his own insurance. If he did not the Panama Railroad Company would be liable, and this provision does not contemplate insurance against the liability of the company. It only contemplates insurance against actual loss of property belonging to the company.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman inform the committee whether or not there is any item in here carrying money to bring back to the United States the remains of our employees who die down in the Zone?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, if we pay the expense of those returning who are alive, as we do, I do not think the gentleman from Tennessee needs to concern himself much about defraying the expenses of returning the remains of those who die there. We are, of course, doing that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I was just in hopes that we would treat our people that go to that terrible death hole as fairly as we do in the Philippine Islands. That is all. I just wanted to know.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to enter into a contract for furnishing to the United States all electric current used for any purpose whatsoever, except for the lighting of streets, avenues, alleys, or highways, in or in connection with any and all buildings within or in the vicinity of the District of Columbia owned or occupied by the United States or owned or occupied by the District of Columbia, excepting only such buildings as may be occupied by the Congress of the United States; payment for such current to be at the annual rate of 6 cents per kilowatt hour for the first million kilowatt hours and at 2½ cents per kilowatt hour for each or any part of each succeeding kilowatt hour; all current to be metered in the respective buildings and the proportionate cost of the total consumption to be charged against each Department of the United States Government and the government of the District of Columbia, respectively, and paid monthly or quarterly, as it may be agreed, in gross, by the Secretary of the Treasury, to the contractor in accordance with the provisions of the contract herein authorized and out of the appropriations made by Congress from year to year therefor; of the amounts paid on account of the government of the District of Columbia one-half shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia. During the fiscal year 1909 payments for electric current under any contract made hereunder shall be made out of appropriations made for the purchase of electric current or for purchase, installation, operation, maintenance, or repair of electrical apparatus within the territory covered by said contract, and for the purpose of such payment said appropriations are hereby expressly made available. For the fiscal year 1910, and annually thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury shall submit estimates for specific appropriations to meet the obligations of any contract entered into hereunder. In consideration of the rates for current herein specified the contract authorized hereunder shall be for the period of ten years, conditioned, however, that the same may be terminated by the Secretary of the Treasury at any time within the period of the contract, provided that written notice of such purpose to terminate shall have been given to the contractor one year prior to the date of the proposed termination.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I demand that the gentleman make it or waive the point.

Mr. TAWNEY. I insist on the point of order being made, not reserved.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, if the gentlemen of the committee who report this feel that way about it, I make the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentlemen of the committee realize, although this is a provision put in here on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury after full consideration and investigation, that it is not in order, and therefore insist on the point of order being made and not reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Was that point of order made against the whole paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. Against the whole paragraph.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I wanted some information from somebody. I wanted to ask a scientific question, or to ask a question that might elicit some scientific information. I wanted to know what a kilowatt hour is. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

From and after the execution of such contract all current actually furnished by the contractor for such buildings as may be occupied by Congress shall be at the same rates fixed by said contract, and the United States shall be entitled at any time during the period of said contract to take and receive such current as the superintendent of the Capitol building and grounds may determine for the buildings occupied by Congress at the rates and under the terms of said contract.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia makes the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The point of order is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows and concluded the reading of the bill:

SEC. 10. That all sums appropriated by this act for salaries of officers and employees of the Government shall be in full for such salaries for the fiscal year 1909, and all laws or parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the language—

And all laws or parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman makes the point of order, it must be made against the whole section.

Mr. BENNET of New York. No; against that language.

Mr. TAWNEY. Of course the gentleman realizes that this would obviate some litigation in the future.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to be heard?

Mr. TAWNEY. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks this is legislation, and sustains the point. The Clerk will return now to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHANEY], on page 79, and report the amendment.

Insert as a new paragraph, after line 9, page 79, the following:
"For continuing the work authorized by the act approved March 3, 1891, and for the protection of the lives of miners in the Territories, in the District of Alaska, and in public and Indian lands wheresoever situated, and for conducting such investigations as will increase safety and efficiency in mining, to be immediately available, $50,000."

Mr. HACKNEY. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order that I made the other day, when that was ruled out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri renews the point of order, and the Chair, adhering to the former ruling on the proposition, sustains the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the several amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WATSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21260, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the rules be suspended, that the amendments recommended by the committee be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Is there any possibility of getting a separate vote on one particular amendment in this outfit?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not suppose there is.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule a second is ordered. The gentleman from Minnesota is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Missouri is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not desire to occupy any time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I have occupied all the time on this bill that I care to consume.

The SPEAKER. As neither gentleman desires to occupy time, the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to suspend the rules, agree to the amendments, and pass the bill as amended.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, pending that I move that the House now take a recess until 11.30 to-morrow morning.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary question. Are the yeas and nays ordered?

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are ordered. The gentleman from New York moves that the House take a recess until to-morrow at 11.30 a. m.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk proceeded and completed the first call of the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is not this the anniversary of the birthday of the Speaker of this House?

The SPEAKER. It is hardly in order to interrupt a roll call——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I simply wish to say that we all wish you many happy returns. [Loud applause and cries of "Speech! Speech!"]

The SPEAKER. Except by unanimous consent it is hardly in order to interrupt a roll call; but in the absence of objection, I sincerely thank the gentleman from Missouri, my personal friend, as I am his, my political opponent, as I am his, for his kindly remembrance of this, the seventy-second anniversary of my birth. I sometimes wish I could forget it, and that everybody else could; but after all, it is some compensation for being 72, that friends recollect the birthday anniversary with kind words and thoughts. Many years of service in the House of Representatives authorize me to state, as I have stated before, that so far as I know or believe, there is no greater legislative body than the bodies which constitute the Congress of the United States. And after these years of service I want to say that in my judgment the personnel of the Sixtieth Congress is quite equal to the personnel of any Congress in which I have served.

In filibustering times we occasionally have something of temper, something of temporary feeling. In all contests between virile men, touching matters of importance to the country and to civilization, the controversies are sharp; and as ours is a Government through parties, there is a political game to play for advantage in approaching campaigns. But be it said that, while we are partisans in the country and partisans in the House, we are all citizens of the same country, and on each side of the center aisle there is integrity, fidelity, and patriotism; and the policies we advocate are those which, as we see them from our respective standpoints, we believe to be best for the whole country. And one of the things noticeable in the House, and one of the things belonging to our civilization here in the United States, is that in our contests we do not strike below the belt. [Applause.] Or if, perchance, in temper, some individual so strikes, he regrets it. If he does not regret it, he drops out and is forgotten.

I thank you again for this kindly remembrance. And now the Clerk will call the names of those not answering upon the first roll call. [Laughter.]

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order for me to ask unanimous consent that the roll call be further dispensed with out of consideration of the fact that this is the Speaker's birthday?

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that the request would hardly be fair to those who are recorded or, rather, to those who are not recorded, and then the Chair is not sure whether or not a quorum is disclosed.

Mr. MACON. Then, Mr. Speaker, in consideration of the fact that this is the Speaker's birthday, and that he would have to be detained here for perhaps fifteen minutes longer or more if a quorum was not developed, I ask unanimous consent that the order directing the roll call be vacated, and that the House stand at recess as a mark of respect to and in consideration of the birthday of the distinguished Presiding Officer of the House. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. [Applause.]

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until to-morrow at 11.30 a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Postmaster-General submitting an estimate of appropriation for payment of transportation of mails from Hawaii to the Orient (H. R. Doc. 916)—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 8, 1908.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. KEAN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

COMMODITY CLAUSE OF INTERSTATE-COMMERCE LAW.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmittting, in response to a resolution of the 6th instant, certain information relating to the compliance of railroads engaged in interstate commerce with paragraph 5 of the amended section 1 of the act to regulate commerce, commonly known as the "commodities clause," which, with the accompanying paper, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

DELAWARE FORCES IN THE REVOLUTION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Librarian of Congress, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 5th instant, copies of all the accounts, papers, and documents relating to Henry Fisher, of Delaware and the Revolutionary forces, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 21260) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

S. 29. An act to provide for registration of all cases of tuberculosis in the District of Columbia, for free examination of sputum in suspected cases, and for preventing the spread of tuberculosis in said District; and

H. J. Res. 179. Joint resolution amending the joint resolution for the relief of storm sufferers in Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, and Louisiana, approved April 30, 1908.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution of the legislature of Louisiana, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution making application to the Congress of the United States to call a convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

Whereas we believe that Senators of the United States should be elected directly by the voters; and

Whereas to authorize such direct election an amendment to the Constitution of the United States is necessary; and

Whereas the failure of Congress to submit such amendment to the States has made it clear that the only practicable method of securing a submission of such amendment to the States is through a constitutional convention, to be called by Congress upon the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of all the States: Therefore be it

Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Louisiana:

SECTION 1. That the legislature of the State of Louisiana hereby makes application to the Congress of the United States, under Article V of the Constitution of the United States, to call a constitutional convention for proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

SEC. 2. That this resolution, duly authenticated, shall be delivered forthwith to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, with the request that the same shall be laid before the said Senate and House.

J. W. HYAMS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
J. Y. SANDERS,
Lieutenant-Governor and President of the Senate.

Approved November 25, 1907.

NEWTON C. BLANCHARD,
Governor of the State of Louisiana.

A true copy.

Mr. MARTIN. I present a joint resolution of the legislature of Virginia, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses, as follows:

Joint resolution.

Be it resolved by the house of delegates of the State of Virginia (the senate concurring), That the representatives of the State of Virginia in the Senate and the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, now in session at Washington, D. C., be, and they are hereby, requested to urge the passage of H. R. bill No. 4848, introduced by the Hon. H. L. MAYNARD, to provide for acquirement, by condemnation, of lands at Cape Henry, Va., for the purposes of fortifications and coast defenses, and that said fortifications may be provided as speedily as possible.

Agreed to, general assembly of Virginia January 15, 1908.

JOHN W. WILLIAMS,
Clerk House of Delegates and Keeper of Rolls of Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN. I present a joint resolution of the legislature of Virginia, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

Joint resolution.

Whereas the question of an inland waterway along the Atlantic coast for the passage of large vessels and ships of war is being agitated, and the fact that such route would be of great advantage from a strategetic standpoint in case of war, as well as of great importance from a commercial standpoint, and would permit safe water transportation south, avoiding the dangerous coast off Hatteras, which is of such a menace to commerce, causing high insurance for valuable cargoes, thereby increasing freight rates, etc.; and

Whereas upon the completion of the Panama Canal an inland waterway will be essentially necessary to afford quick transportation under all conditions of weather, and will be of great benefit, especially to the farmers of the country in transporting their produce through this route, thence through the Panama Canal to the Far East to new and larger fields of trade: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of delegates (the senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby, requested to use their influence and vote for the passage of a bill embracing a liberal appropriation for an inland waterway along the Atlantic coast; and that before any route is finally selected through this State, our Representatives in Congress are further directed to request the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a board of naval officers to ascertain, upon inspection, the best route, in their opinion, from a naval standpoint, taking into consideration all the advantages other than from an engineering standpoint, which is fully covered by the report of the Army engineers, and this report to be submitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Navy for its information and guidance in dealing with the question.

It is directed that the clerk of this house forward certified copies of these resolutions to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Navy, the presiding officers of both Houses of Congress, and to each of Virginia's representatives in the Congress of the United States.

Agreed to by the general assembly of Virginia January 14, 1908.

A bill (S. 7054) to authorize inscriptions to be made on the tombstones of officers or enlisted men of the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the regular or volunteer forces who may be buried in any of the national cemeteries, using the highest lineal and brevet rank held in the militia, Naval Militia, or National Guard of any of the States, Territories, or District of Columbia.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $30,000 to enable A. H. Emery to complete the gun carriage that he is making for the Government, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FULTON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000 for the construction of a launch for the use of the customs service at and in the vicinity of Portland, Oreg., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for necessary repairs to the dredger Chinook, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NIXON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Nevada, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $214,335.25 to pay the unpaid expenses of the constitutional convention of Oklahoma, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $214,335.25 to pay the unpaid expenses of the constitutional convention of Oklahoma, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CARTER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $20,000 for the extension of the public-land surveys over the area embraced within the exterior limits of the Fort Keogh Military Reservation, in Montana, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $70,000 for the purchase of private lands embraced within the boundaries of the Sequoia National Park, California, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment providing for the recording hereafter in the division of dead letters all dead letters and parcels containing valuable and salable articles of merchandise, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $78,500 for one shop building for manufacture of artillery ammunition, including its equipment, at the Frankford Arsenal, at Philadelphia, Pa., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 to pay the city of Albuquerque, N. Mex., for expenses incident to the international exposition to be held in that city in September, 1908, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $17,000 to defray the cost of printing and binding a new edition of Street Directory of the Principal Cities of the United States, intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $178,500 for the enlargement of Frankford Arsenal, Philadelphia, Pa., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—WILLIAM G. GLASGOW.

On motion of Mr. BURKETT, it was Ordered, That there may be withdrawn from the files of the Senate all papers relative to the bill (S. 1099) granting a pension to William G. Glasgow, Sixtieth Congress, first session, there having been no adverse report thereon.

ACCIDENTS AT RAILWAY MAIL CATCH STATIONS.

Mr. PENROSE submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, directed, if not inconsistent with the public interest, to furnish for the information of the Senate of the United States on or before January 1, 1909, the causes of injuries to persons, and damage and destruction of mail and mail equipment from accidents resulting from delivering and receiving mail to and from moving trains at what are known as "catch stations," and what such damage and destruction of mail or mail equipment costs the United States annually.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 21260. An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and, on motion of Mr. ALLISON, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PENSION LEGISLATION—PENSION AGENCIES.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask to be relieved from further service as one of the conferees on the bill (H. R. 16268) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and also on the bill (S. 2420) granting an increase of pension to Margaret K. Hern, and that the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM] be substituted in my place. I will state that my reason for asking the substitution is that I must leave to-morrow for a short absence, and I think the conferences should go on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota asks to be excused from service as a conferee on the part of the Senate upon the bills he has indicated, in conference between the two Houses.

The Chair appoints the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM] as conferee on the bills mentioned by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] and in place of said Senator. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think it proper at this time to make a very brief statement of our progress in the consideration of the pension appropriation bill. I do this because we seem to be in more or less of a deadlock upon a single proposition; and as the bill passed the Senate without the slightest consideration in the matter of debating any of its provisions, and as the conferees are not informed entirely as to the sentiment of the Senate upon that one provision, I wish that the conferees could receive some information by some method from the Senate touching the particular point in difference.

It will be remembered that the appropriation bill passed the Senate without any debate whatever. As the bill passed the House it provided for the salary of one agent for the payment of pensions at $4,000. The Senate amended this item by providing for eighteen agencies at $72,000. The bill as passed by the House carried for clerk hire in the pension agency $335,000; the Senate amendment provided for $435,000 for all the agencies, or a difference of $100,000.

The Commissioner of Pensions in testifying before the House Committee on Appropriations stated that the appropriation to start with could be reduced about $100,000 for clerk hire, in case there should be an abolition of seventeen of the eighteen agencies; that that would be the amount which would probably be deducted the first year; and that after things were adjusted and running in good shape there could be a considerable further reduction. There would, of course, be the reduction, as the Senate can understand, of $68,000 for the seventeen agencies.

On page 9 of the hearings before the House subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations the Commissioner of Pensions states that he thinks it would be safe to cut clerk hire $100,000.

On the same page he states:

> We will have room in the event that we are allowed the entire Pension building for pension purposes; that is, if they surrender us the whole building. We have the board of appeals in there now, of the Secretary's office, and one room is occupied by the Indian Office.

I ask to have the testimony of Commissioner Warner, on pages 5 to 11, inclusive, inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, so that it will present concisely and briefly the grounds relied upon for abolishing these agencies.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CONSOLIDATION OF PENSION AGENCIES.

Mr. GARDNER. In case of consolidation, has an estimate been made including the saving in stationery and other necessary expenses?

Mr. KEIFER. I would suggest that Commissioner Warner state specifically his plan of consolidation and the estimates that would be required in case of the consolidation. We will hear you, Mr. Commissioner, in your own way about that.

Commissioner WARNER. If there is a consolidation here in Washington we should be given time to effect it, though we would call the agencies in as fast as possible. In the case of the agencies which make payment on the 4th day of next April, we would wait until after that April payment had been made by the agencies, and then we would immediately call them in, bringing here their books, their clerks, and all that would be necessary to bring, so as to have them here in time to issue for the next payment, in July, from this Office. For those agencies that pay in May we would wait until the May payment had been made, and then we would call them in, so that they would be ready to make their next payment from here. That would enable us to effect the consolidation without any delay or inconvenience. We could simply keep the matter going, keep step, without any trouble. It would be necessary to bring some clerks from each agency, possibly all of them to start with, until we could get matters adjusted. The appropriation, to start with, could be reduced $100,000 on the item of clerk hire for the first year, anyway, and it would be more than that after we got the thing adjusted and running in good shape. There would also be a reduction of $72,000 on account of the salaries of agents; but it would be necessary, unless you required the Commissioner of Pensions to sign vouchers, to have a disbursing officer do that and to give bond. As far as I personally am concerned, it would be better for me if the agencies should remain just as they are, as their consolidation would make me additional responsibility and labor; but looking at it from a business point of view and as if it were my own business, I would consolidate them instantly, or as soon as it could be done. It would be more economical for the Government, and it would work better than to have these agencies scattered all over the country. The work would go smoother, mistakes could be corrected more quickly, information obtained at once, and the records be kept in better shape.

Mr. KEIFER. What have you to say on the subject of delay, if there would be any, in the matter of paying pensioners?

Commissioner WARNER. There would be very little delay. There would be some delay on the first payment, for instance, for the pensioners living in California, or on the Pacific coast. The first payment might be delayed a few days, but in my opinion not to exceed five. That is, they would get their first payment five days later than if the payment had been made from San Francisco. But after the first payment is made, they will receive their money every ninety days, that is, with an interval of ninety days between the payments, just as at present; so that there will be no delay excepting in the places on the Pacific coast, and at great distances, and then only in the first payment. Otherwise there would be no delay at all.

Mr. KEIFER. You say, Mr. Commissioner, that there would be no delay excepting on the first payment. Would there not be some delay in sending in the voucher after pay day came; that is, after the voucher was pased upon here, would there not be delay in sending the check back?

Commissioner WARNER. That is true; it would take time to send in the voucher, that is true; but there would be the same interval between the payments after the first payment. They would then receive their pay every ninety days.

Mr. KEIFER. But there would be a delay. The pensioner would have to send his pension voucher on a certain date, and it would have to come here and be passed upon, and the check sent back. The delay would be the difference between the two different times occasioned by the time consumed in the mails.

Commissioner WARNER. Yes; but only for the first time. After that he would receive his pension every ninety days. The first payment would be postponed about ten days on the Pacific coast—that is, he would receive it ten days later than he would otherwise receive it; but after that he would get it just ninety days from that time.

Mr. GARDNER. What delay would there be to pensioners living east of the Mississippi River?

Commissioner WARNER. The mail east of the Mississippi River would arrive in twenty-four hours, and then it would take twenty-four hours to get the check back. There would also be twenty-four hours consumed each way at Chicago. There would be one more day consumed to Milwaukee. Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis, Louisville, and New York would require twenty-four hours.

Mr. GARDNER. All New England could be reached in twenty-four hours.

Commissioner WARNER. Oh, yes; that is my understanding.

Mr. GARDNER. Substantially all places in New England could be reached in twenty-four hours, though there might be some remote places where it would take longer. How would it be for Texas?

Commissioner WARNER. That is west of the Mississippi River.

Mr. THOMPSON. The naval pensioners in Texas are now paid from this city.

Commisioner WARNER. Yes; and we have never had any complaint from the naval pensioners.

Mr. BOWERS. As I understand it, the result of that delay would be the initial delay on the first payment, and it would establish a new ninety-day period.

Commissioner WARNER. Yes; that is it.

Mr. GARDNER. And the first delay east of the Mississippi River would hardly be perceptible?

Commissioner WARNER. No.

Mr. KEIFER. Is there anything further that you want to say on the subject of these agencies?

Commissioner WARNER. I have nothing to say; they have been running very satisfactorily and the agents have been taking care of the business in good shape. We have no fault to find with any of them.

Mr. GARDNER. Your idea, in case of the consolidation, is to use as many of the clerks now employed by the several agencies as would be necessary to conduct the business.

Commissioner WARNER. Oh, yes. We will want the same clerks. We would bring the majority of them from each agency here with their records, so as to have them go right to work. In the Pension Bureau proper we have no more clerks than we need, and we have no one to spare to put in the agencies to do that work. I do not expect to have any clerks to spare as I never fill any vacancies in the Bureau. If there is a vacancy by death, resignation, or dismissal for cause, I do not fill that vacancy. I have complied with the provisions of every appropriation act without being compelled to dismiss a single clerk, and yet our force is 312 less than it was when I took charge of the office. There have been no dismissals except for cause. If I filled vacancies, I would be compelled to dismiss. Under this arrangement the clerks feel better, they feel more secure in their places, and they are more happy and contented.

Mr. KEIFER. Do you think it will be practicable to remove the clerks from San Francisco, Topeka, and Knoxville, for instance, to Washington to do this work?

Commissioner WARNER. Oh, yes; they would be glad to come.

Mr. KEIFER. At least as many of them as you need.

Commissioner WARNER. Yes. We ask for an appropriation of $10,000 to effect the transfer of the property and the clerks. We will have to have an extra appropriation of $10,000 for that purpose, but we reduce our appropriations $172,000 on account of agents and clerk hire.

Mr. GARDNER. How long, in case it should be decided to make this consolidation, would it be before the consolidation could be made complete?

Commissioner WARNER. I should think that we ought to have it complete in six months.

Mr. THOMPSON. Take the first group; they pay in April. As the Commissioner has stated, we would bring those in here immediately after the April payment and get ready for the July payment, which could be made from the Bureau. The next group would pay in May, and we would bring them right in and get ready for the next payment from here.

Mr. BOWERS. Then the whole transfer would practically be complete before this appropriation went into effect.

Commissioner WARNER. But we could not commence making the payments until July, when the act would go into effect.

Mr. THOMPSON. The agents draw their salary up to the 1st of July. We would have to get the agencies in here and be ready at that time.

Mr. KEIFER. But it is probable that it would take some months after the beginning of the new fiscal year to effect the consolidation.

Commissioner WARNER. If you make the $10,000 appropriation immediately available, then we could commence consolidation at once.

Mr. BOWERS. The transfer would then be completed earlier and the reorganization would be carried for some months in this year. I should think that the reorganization could be cared for out of the appropriation made for clerk hire.

Mr. KEIFER. Would there be any other incidental expenses in transferring the agencies here?

Commissioner WARNER. Nothing that I know of.

Mr. THOMPSON. No expense, excepting the shipment of the records in here from the different cities, though we would probably have to buy some furniture, because the furniture has been furnished by the Treasury Department to agents that are located now in Government buildings, and it belongs to that Department.

Commissioner WARNER. But I think that would not amount to much.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Commissioner, will you make a summary of what you think would be necessary to put in our appropriation bill for the next year, or to be made immediately available; and also the appropriation that will be necessary to carry out the plans that you advocate? If you will make such a summary, we will incorporate it in the record.

Commissioner WARNER. We can do that.

Mr. BOWERS. On the first page of Document No. 352, regarding the proposed consolidation, the following language is used: "The annual expenditure on account of the payment of pensions, including the salaries of pension agents, clerk hire, contingent expenses, and the printing of vouchers, checks, is approximately $550,000, an average cost per pensioner of 55 cents per annum. It is estimated that after a consolidation has been completed and in perfect working order, all pensioners should be paid by the Commissioner of Pensions or one disbursing officer, located in the city of Washington, with an annual expenditure of, at most, $350,000, a saving of 20 cents per annum per pensioner, or $200,000. After the first year of the consolidation I am of the opinion that the appropriation for the expense of paying pensions could be safely reduced at least $25,000 more."

Mr. KEIFER. What I was after, Mr. Commissioner, and Mr. BOWERS's inquiries are in the same direction, is this: Would we make any mistake if we undertook to provide for your plan of consolidation? We should have all of this in the form of a memorandum.

Commissioner WARNER. We have an amendment already drawn.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; you asked me to prepare something showing what would be necessary to add to this bill to make it effective.

Commissioner WARNER. I will read this amendment that we have prepared. [Reads]:

"And provided, further, That on and after July 1, 1909, all sums appropriated for the payment of Army and Navy pensions and fees of examining surgeons shall be disbursed by the Commissioner of Pensions, through a disbursing clerk to be designated by him, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. The disbursing clerk thus designated shall be required to give bond, with good and sufficient surety, for such amount and in such form as the Secretary of the Interior may approve.

"The Commissioner of Pensions is hereby authorized and directed, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to arrange the pensioners, for the payment of pensions, in three groups, as he may think proper; and may from time to time change any pensioner from one group to another as he may deem convenient for the transaction of the public business. The pensioners in the first group shall be paid their quarterly pensions on January 4, April 4, July 4, and October 4 of each year; the pensioners in the second group shall be paid their quarterly pensions on February 4, May 4, August 4, and November 4 of each year; and the pensioners in the third group shall be paid their quarterly pensions on March 4, June 4, September 4, and December 4 of each year. The Commissioner of Pensions is hereby fully authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to cause payments of pensions to be made for the fractional parts of quarters created by such change so as to properly adjust all payments as herein provided.

"In case of sickness or unavoidable absence of the disbursing clerk from his office, the Commissioner of Pensions may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, authorize the chief clerk of his office or some other clerk employed therein to temporarily act as such disbursing clerk.

"And with the approval of the Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of the Interior, the disbursing clerk may designate and authorize the necessary number of clerks to sign the name of the disbursing clerk to official checks.

"The official bond given by the disbursing clerk shall be held to cover and apply to the acts of the person appointed to act in his place.

"The sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated, to be immediately available, to meet the expenses of carrying into effect the changes herein provided for."

Mr. BOWERS. You have not suggested, Mr. Commissioner, just exactly how much, in case this consolidation goes into effect, this estimate for clerk hire and so forth can be safely cut.

Commissioner WARNER. I think it would be safe to cut it $100,000. I think possibly it could be cut much more, but that is safe.

Mr. BOWERS. You have the expense of the reorganization, of course, to bear out of the clerk hire appropriation.

Commissioner WARNER. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. And there is also the extra work involved in making the consolidation.

Commissioner WARNER. I think it would work smoother than you imagine; that is, I think in the work of bringing the agencies in, and changing the location, everything would go smoothly.

Mr. GARDNER. Will you have plenty of room in the Pension building?

Commissioner WARNER. Thank you for that suggestion. We will have room in the event that we are allowed the entire Pension building for pension purposes—that is, if they surrender us the whole building. We have the Board of Appeals in there now, of the Secretary's office, and one room is occupied by the Indian Office. If those rooms were restored to us, we would have plenty of room.

Mr. KEIFER. That could be done without any legislation.

Commissioner WARNER. Yes; I think the Secretary would do that.

Mr. KEIFER. I notice that there has been some effort made to secure part of that building for the purpose of storing away old patent models. Do you think that they ought to be there?

Commissioner WARNER. I do not want them in there, but if the Secretary wants them, then I do. Anything he wants I am for.

Mr. GARDNER. Your thought is that everything strictly connected with the operation of the Pension Bureau should be put under one roof?

Commissioner WARNER. All under one roof.

Mr. GARDNER. So that the Bureau would have ready access to all of the papers in case questions arise.

Mr. WARNER. Yes. It will be a great convenience to have all of the pensions paid from that building. In case we want to know anything about a change of residence of a man who has been paid from a San Francisco agency, or any change regarding his condition whatever, we would be able to get that information at once. As it is now we have to write a letter, and wait for the reply, for we must first communicate with San Francisco. We would be able, in the event of the consolidation, to get any information in regard to any of these cases within a few minutes, no matter whether it related to a pensioner on the Pacific coast, in Iowa, or anywhere else.

Mr. GARDNER. Besides the New York office, where you rent rooms, is there any complaint about any of the quarters in other places where these agencies are now located?

Commissioner WARNER. Occasionally we hear some complaint about the amount of room that they have, the conveniences, and so forth, though I could not specify the agencies at this time.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Columbus agency was very much crowded. Congress has made an appropriation for a new building there, and pending the completion of that building, the Treasury Department has rented a building and is giving us sufficient room.

Commissioner WARNER. I would like to say that there is not a more pleasant or a more healthful office building in the United States for clerical work than the Pension building here in Washington. Every room has an outside exposure, we have large corridors inside, with a very large court, making substantially two outside exposures. It is the healthiest and pleasantest office for clerical work that I know of.

Mr. GARDNER. Your judgment is that this consolidation would be ideal for handling the whole pension business, for the adjustment of pensions, the concentration of the correspondence, and everything connected with them? You believe that putting it all in that building is the best possible arrangement?

Commissioner WARNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARDNER. You could not suggest anything more perfect for the operation of the whole pension machinery?

Commissioner WARNER. No; it would all be in a nutshell instead of being scattered all over the United States, as it is now, with eighteen different agencies. The pensions would all be paid from here the same as the interest on the public debt.

Mr. BOWERS. And would there not be some saving in the matter of duplication of records? As it is now a record has to be kept in both the central Pension Office and in the branch offices.

Commissioner WARNER. A great saving, yes. As it is now, the certificate is recorded here, then it is sent out to the pension agency, and it is recorded there, and there is considerable duplication all the way through. Under the consolidation arrangement we would have it all in one office, and that would be the end of it. It would save clerk hire, time, and labor. If this were a private business, no business man would hesitate ten seconds in coming to a decision as to what he would do. He would consolidate it. While, with an official like myself, in the Government service, and for whom it is going to make additional work, he would not be very anxious for it, and personally I do not care anything about the consolidation, yet in the interest of the Government I think it would be a very good thing.

Mr. KEIFER. Are all naval pensions paid from here, from the Washington office?

Mr. THOMPSON. The Washington agency pays the District of Columbia, Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, West Virginia, and all pensioners residing in foreign countries. In addition to that it pays the naval pensioners from the Knoxville district, which comprises all of the Southern States as far west as Texas. Naval pensions are also paid by the Chicago, the San Francisco, Boston, New York and Philadelphia offices.

Mr. KEIFER. But the other pension agencies do not pay naval pensions?

Mr. THOMPSON. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. Secretary Garfield substantiates the statement that is made by the Commissioner of Pensions. He also testifies that he could get rid of these agencies as fast as possible, and he thinks that he could dispose of all of the seventeen in about six months. The Senate will therefore see that it would be necessary, in any event, to appropriate, we will say, for about half of them, for at least three months.

It is stated that there will be $100,000 clerk hire saved. That is assuming that the clerk hire would practically be the same in the city of Washington as it is elsewhere, and that the same number of clerks would perform exactly the same amount of business. Every man acquainted with the Government service knows, first, that the amount of service performed by each clerk generally is about one-third more outside of the city of Washington than in the Departments here in Washington. We all understand also that the amount paid for clerk hire is nearly 50 per cent higher here in the city of Washington than it is in other cities in the United States. So I think when we consider those matters it will be found that it will neutralize to a great extent the statement concerning the saving of $100,000.

The Commissioner also says that he would take practically all the clerks now engaged in the several agencies and transfer them to the Washington agency. If he did that he would have to add about 50 per cent for salaries and deduct about 25 per cent for work, and this would materially reduce the saving.

The Commissioner also says, on page 8, that after consolidation has been completed and is in perfect working order all pensioners could be paid by the Commissioner of Pensions or the disbursing officer located in the city of Washington with an annual expenditure of at most $350,000, saving $200,000, and he is of the opinion that after the first year of consolidation the appropriation for the expenses of paying the pensions could be safely reduced $25,000 more.

It is safe to say also that while under the present distribution no post-office requires a larger number of clerks on account of the pension business, if we consolidate all of them in the city of Washington, meaning the handling of about a million letters, at least, or more every month, there would be a considerable increase in such clerk hire in the post-office, which has not been taken into consideration whatever; and there would be, undoubtedly, an addition of service in other respects.

Now, the House conferees stand upon the position that the undisputed evidence shows the fact that the services could be performed just as well for at least two or three hundred thousand dollars less, and that the interests of economy demand that these extra agencies should be abolished.

Mr. President, as one of the Senate conferees, I think, for the reasons I have mentioned, the savings are overestimated. I will assume that possibly the service could be economized by abolishing the agencies to some extent, but what we would gain in economy, in my opinion, would be more than made up in certain other losses. I can not help but feel that it is for the interest of all of the people of the United States that the functions of government should be performed as much as possible, when it can be done without detriment to the service, away from the seat of government. This is an immense country, Mr. President, and the nearer we can bring the public in contact with the Government and with the functions of government the better it will be for the Government, and for the people as well.

As a matter of education, I believe that the people should be brought into as close proximity with every arm of the public service and into an acquaintanceship with the functions of the public service as near as it is possible to do so without detriment. The majority of the people of the United States have little better understanding of the mode by which they are governed and by which government functions are exercised than they have of the same matters in foreign countries. I do not believe it is a healthful condition to concentrate everything possible in the city of Washington, even though it may be done with a little greater economy.

I have no doubt that it would add very materially to all our great industrial concerns if they were consolidated under one great control, and the cost of production would be less than it is to-day. But to the same extent that the cost of production would be less the individual opportunity would also be lessened. The expense that you would save by concentrating everything in the city of Washington you would lose by divorcing the public from the business of the country. So my view has been that it is better, even though there be a little extra cost, that we perform just as many of the functions of government as we possibly can among the people and all over the United States.

Mr. President, I make this statement simply to give the Senate the view I believe to be that of the Senate conferees, and to receive through argument or by instructions the sentiment of the Senate upon the same question, as it has not had an opportunity to express itself before.

Mr. HALE. I do not understand, Mr. President, that the Senator submits any conference report or anything upon which perhaps the Senate could take formal action. If the conference report had been presented, the Senate could put itself on record by yeas and nays, and I should hope the feeling would be nearly or quite unanimous; but the Senate can by expression here show to the House what is the attitude of this body.

It is not, Mr. President, a question of the saving of a few thousand dollars, but there are no offices of the Government that are so popular with the people, that are so near to them and to the old pensioners as the pension offices throughout the United States. I do not know of a single fault that is found with the management of one of them. I do not know of any scandal that has ever arisen as to the course of business pursued in a single one of those agencies. They are run economically and frugally, with a comparatively small force, and every pensioner knows that the drafts coming to him will be sent to these offices and he can have them at once forwarded to him near by or he can go to the office and get them and can visit the office as pensioners do frequently.

I know in the State of Maine the present agent was a veteran soldier of the Army of the Republic in the war, a man of distinguished service, who lost the use of a leg in one of the great battles of that conflict, and who was afterwards honored by the State of Maine in being selected and serving for several terms as governor of the State. He is to-day in charge of the agency in Maine, and there is no day that some pensioner does not appear there, and his kindly way of treating them and greeting them and hearing their stories all contribute to the comfort and satisfaction of the pensioners.

With such considerations, the mere matter of saving a few thousand dollars is a bagatelle, and I hope the Senate will not consider it. I hope the conferees in this matter will stand pat. The law is good as it is now. Its operation is good. The movement is made from the House to change the existing administration. Everybody knows that in conference the burden is upon the side which seeks to change existing statutes and administration; and all that the Senate conferees need to do is to stand upon that ground, and in the end there can be but one result.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I trust that the conferees on the part of the Senate will pursue the course that they have already adopted and insist that the amendment that was placed upon the bill by the Senate in making provisions for the salaries of the eighteen agents shall become a part of the bill. I sympathize entirely with the statement of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

I have had occasion since my attention was called to the action of the House to look into the question as to whether there is any economy in the suggestion of the House. My judgment, Mr. President, is that there is no economy in the proposition that is made by the House on this question. I find on looking the matter over that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions do not agree. In the letter that the Secretary of the Interior sent to the Speaker of the House he thinks that there might be a saving of $200,000 per annum. I find in the hearings that were had before the House committee the Commissioner of Pensions thinks that there could be a saving of $100,000 per year for clerk hire and the $72,000 a year that is provided for the pension agents and rental in New York City.

In that estimate he does not take into consideration that some provision would have to be made for higher salaries than the average clerk to fill the position that is held by the eighteen pension agents. No provision is made for that, and no suggestion is made that the cost of clerk hire is any greater in the city of Washington than it is in the various cities where the pension agencies are located.

I find from a statement that was made by Colonel Mulholland, of the Philadelphia agency, that the average clerk hire in the Pension Office here at Washington is $1,280.72, and the average salaries paid at the various agencies aggregate only $977.99, making a difference of $302.73 per clerk each between the salaries paid in the various agencies and the salaries paid to the clerks in the Pension Office.

Now, there are 432 clerks in these eighteen agencies and the difference in salaries aggregates $125,425.60. So it seems to me, Mr. President, that instead of being a reduction in the expenses in paying old soldiers, the amount that is provided for by the Senate in the bill, there will be an actual increase.

There is another item that I desire to call to the attention of Senators that has not been taken into consideration. With the exception of the New York agency all these other agencies are housed in Government buildings. In Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee, Des Moines, and other cities provision is made in the public buildings. So there is no rent for these agencies. If the consolidation is to take place, as is proposed by the Secretary of the Interior, some provision must be made for the clerks who are to be brought here to do the business in the city of Washington.

I find in the hearings that were had before the House committee the Commissioner of Pensions says that if they will remove from the Pension building the board of appeals of the Secretary's Office, and the Indian Office, there may be room here.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I do not want to interrupt the flow of the Senator's remarks, but as this seems to be a move toward a final settlement of the question whether the eighteen agencies shall be continued or not, I want to suggest that if they are to be continued, there should be a redistribution or that some should be added. Take the State that I, in part, have the honor of representing. The pensioners there are compelled to get their pension business through San Francisco. Everything goes from Washington directly through Wyoming to San Francisco, and from San Francisco it is twelve, thirteen, or fourteen hundred miles back to Wyoming; and I think also the same applies to Montana and other States.

Now, that is a matter which ought to be corrected. Possibly we have gone too far now to correct it on the pending bill which is being considered in this conference, but the matter ought to be taken up soon and settled more satisfactorily than the conditions now existing present.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the statement of the Senator from Wyoming, and a little later in my remarks I propose to touch upon that subject and show that instead of consolidating the agencies in Washington we should have more of them, so as to benefit the pensioners, especially in the Western States.

The point I was making when I was interrupted is that there is no economy in the proposition that is made by the Secretary of the Interior, because it is shown that if we consolidate these agencies in Washington, of necessity we must have more space in some other building for the various offices that are now in the Pension building. We must hire offices for the board of appeals, the Secretary's Office, and for the Indian Office. So there would be an additional expense that is not touched upon in the letter of the Secretary of the Interior or by the Commissioner of Pensions.

Another point which has not been considered by them is that it is estimated that nearly 1,000,000 letters per month, if there is a consolidation of the agencies in the city of Washington, will pass through this office to the various sections of the country where these pensioners live that are now handled through the post-offices at the 18 different pension agencies. The consolidation of the agencies at Washington will, therefore, require additional postal service in the Washington post-office to care for this extra work that will be imposed upon the office in this city; and it may be that this extra work which will require an additional clerical force will require additional space, which may entail extra expense upon the Government.

No consideration has been given to any of these questions by the conferees upon the part of the House or by the Secretary of the Interior, who has suggested that the agencies be consolidated.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Commissioner testified that if certain offices were removed—the board of appeals and Indian Office—now occupying space, he then would have room enough, but if they are removed it will necessitate that some other place be secured for them.

Mr. HOPKINS. That would be an additional expense to the Government of the United States.

Here is another question to which I desire to call the attention of Senators. Mr. HALE, a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Tennessee, stated, when this matter was discussed in the House, that on the 7th of February, 1908, he procured a statement from the Commissioner of Pensions showing the expense per capita at these eighteen agencies. This is his statement:

That the public may know that my figures are correct and my statements based upon facts, I submit the following figures furnished me by Commissioner Warner on February 7, 1908, showing cost per pensioner for paying pensioners at each agency in the United States:

Topeka	$0.425
Columbus	.458
Chicago	.518
Knoxville	.509
Indianapolis	.495
Boston	.511
Philadelphia	.530
New York City	.644
Washington	.631
Des Moines	.534
Milwaukee	.544
Buffalo	.564
Pittsburg	.562
San Francisco	.548
Detroit	.582
Louisville	.638
Augusta	.761

(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 19, 1908, p. 3611.)

Now, take the pension agency at Topeka, where, under existing conditions, the agent pays 111,508 pensioners. They are paid there at a per capita expense of 42½ cents; at Chicago for 51 and a fraction cents, and here in Washington, where there is an agency, it is 63 and a fraction cents. I have made a computation, and I find that if we were to remove the agency from Topeka, Kans., to the city of Washington on the present basis it would cost for paying the pensioners who are paid at Topeka, Kans., $23,310 per annum more than it does now. If we were to remove the Chicago agency to the city of Washington and have the pensioners who are provided for at that agency paid here in the city of Washington, it would cost the Government of the United States $9,000 more than it does at the present time. If we should remove the Louisville agency here, it would cost the Government of the United States eight thousand and some hundred dollars more than it does at the present time. I will state that the same applies to San Francisco, Philadelphia, Detroit, Milwaukee, Buffalo, Pittsburg, and many of the other agencies. So, from the figures that have been given to us, the consolidation of the agencies here in the city of Washington would be an actual added expense to the Government of the United States.

But, Mr. President, as the Senator from Maine said, we should not be governed by a few dollars one way or the other when we are considering the rights of the old soldiers. The purpose of this legislation was to aid and protect them, and not to save the Government a few thousand dollars one way or the other. The law which provides for these agencies was passed by Congress February 5, 1867, and I call to the attention of Senators the language of the statute which provided for the establishment of the agencies which are now sought to be consolidated in this city. It is section 4780, and reads as follows:

The President is authorized to establish agencies for the payment of pensions wherever, in his judgment, the public interests and the convenience of the pensioners require.

So one of the salient facts that was in the minds of the legislators at that time was to provide legislation for the convenience of pensioners. Then the balance of the section reaches the question that has been raised by the Senator from Wyoming. It reads as follows:

But the number of pension agencies in any State or Territory shall in no case be increased hereafter so as to exceed three, and no such agency shall be established in addition to those now existing in any State or Territory in which the whole amount of pensions paid during the fiscal year next preceding shall not have exceeded the sum of $500,000.

This shows that it was the intention of Congress at that time to provide agencies enough so that the agent would not be required to disburse much over $500,000 per annum. The intention was to bring the agency home to the old soldiers, so that they could go to the agent and meet him personally and talk with him regarding any question in which as pensioner they might be interested.

Mr. WARREN. Has that plan been carried out, or has any move been made toward carrying it out?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will say to the Senator that it has not, I am sorry to say. I agree with the Senator from Wyoming that the Senate should not only insist that the present agencies should not be consolidated in an agency in Washington, but that there should be a largely increased number of agencies established, especially in the Western States.

Take the Topeka agency. That agency is required under existing law to provide for 111,508 pensioners. Instead of distributing $500,000 per annum, as provided in the law of 1867—a law that was passed by the comrades in arms of those old soldiers who are now pensioners—that one agency in the last fiscal year was required to distribute $15,807,638.24.

Mr. President, take the agency at Chicago. That agency is required to provide for over 75,000 soldiers. Over 60,000 of them live in the State of Illinois. That agency disbursed during the fiscal year 1907 over $10,000,000.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to interrupt the Senator from Illinois just a second to state that if we paid all pensions at the Washington agency as cheaply as they are paid at the Topeka agency it would save the Government $132,000 a year.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, Mr. President, I had that fact to develop later, but I am very much obliged to the Senator from Kansas for bringing it out now, so as to show that the pension agencies in the different States are conducted much more economically than is the agency here in the city of Washington. At least it so seems from figures furnished us.

I will state, in passing, that when this law of a year ago providing for extra pensions to widows, and so forth, was passed, it was charged that the Washington agency, for less than half the work that was imposed upon the other agencies, required seven additional clerks; an additional clerical force not granted to any of the other agencies located in the different States.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I want some assurance from the Senator from Illinois, and from other Senators, regarding this plan of procedure as to whether we shall pay all pensioners from Washington, or pay all from the various pension agencies now existing, or those we may create, according to the argument that they can be paid cheaper from Topeka because of the great amount there paid, or cheaper from Washington or some other place, and solely on the ground of economy. This does not agree with the proposition which is laid down by the Senator as one that was first proposed in 1867 to accommodate the pensioners themselves in the establishment of these agencies.

The pensioners in the Rocky Mountain States—there may not be millions of money to pay, but they were just as valiant in arms as any others, and they have been living out there for forty years or more, and have been receiving their pensions a number of days or weeks later than others have received them, and from an office out on the Pacific coast, anywhere from 1,200 to 1,600 miles away from their homes, while the papers and money goes from Washington right by their doors to San Francisco, and is then brought back.

What I want to know is, whether the plan upon which we are to proceed is to be economy only, or whether it is to be to accommodate the various localities? If the latter, it seems to me that we ought to have some assurance from those who wish to continue these eighteen agencies that that Rocky Mountain country, which has been settling up so rapidly in past years, shall have some care, and agencies established there for the accommodation of her veteran soldiers.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, the whole drift of my remarks are in harmony with the position of the Senator from Wyoming.

One reason why the Topeka agency is conducted more economically than the agency here is because the salaries of the clerks there are less than the salaries in the agency here, and they work a greater number of hours than they do or are required to do here in the city of Washington.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator thinks, then, there should be others besides?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to ask the Senator from Illinois if I understood him correctly in reading the law that the President of the United States establishes these agencies under the law?

Mr. HOPKINS. Under the law of 1867 the President of the United States establishes the agencies.

Mr. GALLINGER. So that the Senator from Wyoming would have to go to the White House if he desired to have an additional agency established, would he not?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes; under this law, unless Congress saw fit by legislative enactment to redistribute these agencies, divide them up, and make a larger number than we have at present.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to ask the Senator one further question, and that is whether it is not a fact that the President can increase, reduce, or abolish all the pension agencies in the United States by Executive order?

Mr. HOPKINS. I am inclined to think that the Senator from New Hampshire is correct.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator from Illinois will excuse me, I tried to look the matter up so as to ascertain when the first agencies were established. The earliest law that I can find, that of 1866, I think is practically in the same wording as this law; but that law was based upon the assumption that some agencies already existed which were created by Congress. If Congress created any by act, then it follows that the President could abolish only those that he had himself under the law created and none that Congress had created.

Mr. GALLINGER. But that, I think, Mr. President, would not apply to the bulk of existing agencies.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think it would.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I understand there have been pension agencies abolished by Executive order.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions a question, I wish to ask, Is it his understanding that the President to-morrow or the following day may establish pension agencies without legislation?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think under the law he has absolutely that authority and has absolutely the authority to abolish any one that has been created by him under that law.

Mr. WARREN. From what fund would such an agent be paid, unless Congress should provide?

Mr. McCUMBER. There would be no provision for payment until Congress should appropriate, of course.

Mr. WARREN. Then it amounts to this, that until Congress makes some provision toward appropriating, it is a question whether the President could or, if he could, whether he would establish new agencies.

Mr. McCUMBER. The President may establish an agency, and then Congress, either in a deficiency bill or otherwise, would be supposed to appropriate for the appointee.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So that amounts, in the last analysis, to the practical fact that he can not.

Mr. WARREN. Has that been the mode of the establishment of these agencies as they now exist?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think all of those established since 1866, at least, have been established by order of the President.

Mr. WARREN. How many were established before that time?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have been unable so far to ascertain the number and what ones were established, and I do not know that a single one exists that was established prior to that time.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, there is another suggestion that I desire to make to Senators on this proposition, and that is, that while we have over 900,000 pensioners, as I understand, there is not one of them that has petitioned for this consolidation which is proposed by the Secretary of the Interior. I know that in the State of Illinois almost every Grand Army post has sent me letters and protests against this consolidation. What is true of the State of Illinois I think is true in all the different States where we have these Grand Army associations. They believe that the spirit of the law as it was enacted by the legislators here nearly forty years ago should be carried out and that these agencies should be placed where the soldiers, who are the pensioners, can see the agents and converse with them upon the various subjects relating to the payment of their pensions.

The pension agent at Chicago tells me that in the city of Chicago, where there are perhaps 20,000 or 25,000 pensioners, when they come to make these payments every pay day to the pensioners, they pay at the pension office more than 4,000 of these pensioners. They come there and talk with the agent; and the pension agent himself goes out over the State to the various Grand Army posts and talks with the soldiers, so that they feel that the Government, through the agent, is interested in them. But if these local agencies are to be abolished and a central office is to be established here in the city of Washington, instead of having agencies where five hundred thousand or a million dollars are distributed we shall have one agency that is required to distribute the $162,000,000 provided for in this bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Just for two questions: First, can the Senator from Illinois tell of any practical questions which the pensioners would have to discuss with the pension agent concerning their pensions?

Mr. HOPKINS. I can tell of many of them. One of them is in respect to errors that the pensioners make in preparing their papers. The pension agent at Chicago tells me that over 18 per cent of those old pensioners who do business with him make errors and have to have their papers corrected. Many of these old soldiers come and talk with him, or with the clerks in his office, with respect to such matters. When the agent goes out among the various Grand Army posts, these questions that are raised in correspondence are discussed, and the pensioners get a more intelligent view as to their duties in preparing papers upon which they are paid their pensions.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. About how many pensioners are there in Illinois?

Mr. HOPKINS. There are over 60,000 in the State of Illinois, and there are over 75,000 pensioners who are paid by the pension agent at Chicago.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is 140,000 pensioners yearly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I meant 15,000 in addition to the 60,000 I have named.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Seventy-five thousand. Now, if a very small percentage of that number were to discuss with the pension agents questions relating to their pensions—and, frankly, I can not see how any would arise—of course it would take several pension agents to answer their questions. It is perfectly clear that, as to making out their papers, they should become very familiar with the law. They have that attended to in their own towns.

Another question is this: I am not against the position of the Senator, but the point I have heard advanced here as to the petitions from the Grand Army post does not seem to be very sound. Is it not pretty clear that a mere request by letter or, especially, by a personal visit would elicit these petitions from the Grand Army post?

Mr. HOPKINS. There has been no letter, I will say to the Senator from Indiana, written by me or by my colleague.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No. The Senator misunderstands me. I understand that. The Senator must acquit me of that. I mean by the pension agent himself. Suppose the pension agent did not want the agency abolished, a mere request to the Grand Army post of course would elicit those petitions.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will say to the Senator that, judging from the communications I have received from different Grand Army posts in Illinois, these communications came to me and to my colleague from them and were not inspired by the agent.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I know, not from the agent.

Mr. HOPKINS. The agent has shown the objections that exist to consolidating all of these agencies in the city of Washington.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator will allow me right here. I have within the last two years not only been present at the annual encampment of the old soldiers, but at a large number of their meetings, and where it has been expressed to me, the sentiment in favor of continuing these agencies has been universal. I have found no man that has ever suggested the idea of reducing the number, but many hundreds, I will say, who have written to me and spoken to me at these meetings—not by petitions—have asked that the agencies be retained. I simply give that as the sentiment of the soldiers themselves.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am in full sympathy with the contention of the Senator from Illinois, I will say, and shall vote to have these agencies retained, but I want to suggest to the Senator that the old soldiers do not go to the pension agencies to discuss matters relating to the payment of their pensions. That is a matter fixed by law. They are paid by check. They do like to go there and talk about the question of getting an increase or of having a bill submitted to Congress, and all those matters, but so far as the payment of the pensions is concerned, all of that is an automatic thing. They are paid by check and the pension agent even hires a girl to stamp his name on the checks.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will say to the Senator that the pension agent at Chicago says that in preparing the necessary papers upon which the pensioners receive their checks over 18 per cent of them contain errors that have to be corrected.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has stated this matter precisely as I have thought it was. Now, with reference to talking to the pension agents about their bills—private pension bills, and things of that kind—of course I think the experience of everybody in both Houses of Congress is that the pensioners do not talk to the pension agents about that question, but they talk to their Representatives or their Senators. So the subjects of conversation are very limited between them.

Mr. HOPKINS. But they send in their applications for increase, and a hundred and one other questions that interest the old soldiers are discussed at these pension agencies. But, as I have stated——

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BULKELEY. I merely want to interrupt the Senator for a moment to confirm, so far as my own State is concerned—and there are several thousand pensioners in Connecticut—every suggestion the Senator from Illinois has made in regard to the feeling of the members of the Grand Army in their respective posts concerning this matter. They are very anxious about it, and endless communications come to me from the old soldiers in Connecticut who are now pensioners asking that the present method be continued as a matter of great convenience to them. They desire to have an agency located somewhere near their vicinity. I think if the number could be increased, so that each State would have a pension agency, it would be better than to attempt to concentrate all of the agencies in Washington.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I have already shown that the law that provides for the establishment of the pension agencies was so framed that the agencies should be numerous enough to meet all the requirements of the soldiers. This legislation is in entire harmony with the law that prevails in administering other departments of the Government. Why, Mr. President, do we have free-delivery service of mails in the cities? It is to benefit the people. Why did we establish the rural free delivery? The farmers for a hundred years were accustomed to go to the post-office to get their mail, and they could for the next hundred years go on in that manner. It was believed, however, to be in the interest of the Government itself to bring this mail service as close to the farmer as it is to residents of cities. The appropriations have increased from year to year since the establishment of the rural free delivery, until we are now appropriating from $30,000,000 to $35,000,000 per year for this service alone. In bringing this service close to the people in the rural districts we did not count the cost in dollars and cents. It was believed that it was in the best interests of the Government to do this. Nobody now in this Chamber or in the House of Representatives would be bold enough to oppose making proper appropriations for the rural free-delivey service.

The same principle that has caused Congress to make appropriations for the rural free-delivery service is the one that should govern and control us in caring for the defenders of the flag during the years from 1861 to 1865.

I think, Mr. President, it would be a great injustice to the old soldies who are now pensioners to consolidate the pension agencies in Washington. It would delay the payment of their pensions and put them to unnecessary and vexatious trouble in securing their quarterly payments. I trust when this question comes to a vote in the Senate that every Senator here will support the action of the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President, the necessity of retaining the pension agencies as they now are has been made so clear by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] that it seems unnecessary for me to say anything; but it has been suggested by several Senators that as I am a member of the Committee on Pensions and voted to retain the pension agencies as they now are, I should briefly give some of the reasons that control me.

Mr. President, I find that forty years ago the Congress of the United States enacted a law declaring—

> The President is authorized to establish agencies for the payment of pensions wherever, in his judgment, the public interest and the convenience of the pensioners require.

At that time there were about 100,000 pensioners in the United States. Now there are 967,000 pensioners. If it was proper at that time and if it has been proper for forty years since that time to provide for these agencies, I think that is a strong argument in favor of continuing them. If we abolish the eighteen pension agencies that are now established in the various States and have one pension agent here at Washington, it is claimed that we will economize. It is said that by doing that we will dispense with the services of seventeen pension agents and thereby save $68,000.

Mr. President, when I hear—not in this Chamber, but elsewhere—men talking about economy in regard to pensions, talking about saving $100,000, I do not think it is appropriate. The bill carries on the face of it $163,000,000. The great addition made to it this year was for the benefit of widows, to allow widows to obtain pensions and increases of pensions amounting to $12 per month. That action added about $12,000,000 to the bill. I am not criticising the pension appropriation bill as reported here at this session; but I am taking exception to the argument in favor of alleged economy, of saving $100,000. I do not believe there is any economy in abolishing eighteen pension agencies located in various States and concentrating the pension business at Washington. The Commissioner of Pensions has stated that the average amount of salaries of pension clerks is about $1,200, and the average annual salaries of clerks at the various pension agencies is about $900; and when other expenses connected with having our pension agent at Washington are considered, I believe there will be but little difference between the present cost and the cost if the payment of pension claims is made at Washington.

This Government ought to grant pensions for the worthy, and if we give pensions we ought to arrange their payment in such a manner as to reach the pensioner as quickly as possible. Under existing law within a week after the pension becomes due nearly every pensioner is paid. If you concentrate here at Washington all the business connected with the payment of pensions, it may be that those who reside in California, in North Dakota, in Oregon, and in other remote States will not get their pensions for a month or more.

The act of Congress under which for forty years pensions have been paid declares that the convenience of the pensioners shall be considered. I think there is no doubt that the convenience of the pensioner requires that the pension agencies should be retained where they are at present.

I was impressed with the statement made by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] that, instead of reducing the number to one, and that to be located here at Washington, we should increase the number, as the President has the power to do under the law.

There is another point, too, that impressed me. I am not in favor of centralizing power at Washington any more than we can help. In all of the years that have passed since the civil war we have not deemed it necessary to centralize at Washington the payment of pensioners, and I am opposed now to doing it. If we pay money to pensioners, we ought to give them every advantage and every convenience. I believe we should act justly to all men, whether they be soldiers or civilians.

While I was not in the Federal Army, I have always been in favor of doing justice to Federal soldiers. I know what it is to be a soldier, and I want to do justice to every soldier. There is nothing that makes our Government and our country more conspicuous than our liberality to those who fought in the Federal Army and to their widows and their minor children.

I hope, Mr. President, that every Senator in this Chamber will support the conferees in the position they have taken and that the provision for eighteen pension agencies will be kept in the pension bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, only a single word. It seems to me, as we spend $163,000,000 in pensions and their disbursement, that to haggle over a possible saving of $150,000 in the expense in dealing with that vast expenditure is rather a small matter. It is a great comfort and convenience to the old soldiers—whether it ought to be so or not is of no consequence—to have these local agencies. It is not apparent that any saving would be made by abolishing them; but even if it were certain that a saving would be effected, it seems to me that we ought to retain the present number of pension agencies. If we are going to distribute these great sums in pensions, we ought to do it in the way that is most agreeable and most convenient to those who receive them. I merely took the floor to say that I am in entire sympathy with the position of the Senator from North Dakota, and I hope the Senate conferees will not think of yielding on the matter.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, has the morning business been closed?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not been closed.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to say a few words on the matter which is under discussion.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, of course I have no wish to cut off the Senator from Kansas. I believe there is no business, however, before the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. I will agree to occupy no more than three or four minutes. I live in a city where there is the largest pension agency in the United States, and I should like to tell the Senate what we think about this proposition.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. TELLER. If I may take the floor on the pending question I will yield to the Senator from Kansas to say what he wants to say. That will be in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Morning business is not closed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Morning business is not closed. This debate is proceeding entirely by unanimous consent.

Mr. TELLER. Excuse me; I thought morning business had closed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not closed. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] took the floor to withdraw as a member of conference committees on pension bills and then to make a statement. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is recognized.

Mr. WARREN. Then I understand that this debate is all by unanimous consent?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. WARREN. I have no objection to the Senator from Kansas proceeding, but I hope that after he has finished we may be able to proceed with the regular order.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, there are 967,000 pensioners on the rolls. They are paid from eighteen agencies, located in different parts of the United States. The amount paid out each year is about $140,000,000. It requires, under the present plan, 432 clerks to make the payments. The average annual salary of the clerks at the pension agencies outside of the city of Washington is $977.99, while the average annual salaries paid clerks in the Bureau of Pensions in this city is $1,280.72. The pension agents, eighteen in number, are paid $4,000 each per annum.

The new plan, which I oppose, is to consolidate all the pension agencies, and in the future make the payments from the city of Washington.

THE QUESTION OF EXPENSE.

It is claimed by those who advocate this change that it would be less expensive to pay the pensioners from the city of Washington than it is under the present plan, but it is evident that they have not carefully considered the question. The only saving they can point out is the reduction in the appropriation for seventeen pension agents, which would amount to $68,000, and the amount of $4,500 a year paid in rent for the agency at New York; this would amount to $72,500, and this is all that can be counted on. What would be the extra expense? The increase in the salary of each clerk would be $302.73. This would amount to $125,425.60. Then the increase in the mail would be not less than 8,000,000 letters to be handled at the Washington post-office. The expense of handling this extra mail at the post-office would be at least $10,500 a year, and it is more than likely to amount to $15,000. On this point I desire to have inserted in the RECORD a letter I have received from the Department, advising me that it would cost $10,500 to handle the additional 8,000,000 letters. I will not take up the time of the Senate to read it, but I should like to have it printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, April 1, 1908.

Hon. CHARLES CURTIS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: With reference to your telephonic inquiry of the postmaster of Washington, D. C., relative to the additional clerical assistance that would be required in his office to handle 4,000,000 additional incoming and the same number of outgoing letters per year for the Bureau of Pensions, also the average salary of the clerks employed, I beg leave to state that from the information furnished by the postmaster as a result of his conversation with you, this additional work, occurring only once each month and probably for a short period, would in all probability be handled by an auxiliary force paid at the rate of 30 cents per hour. It is estimated that this auxiliary service would cost approximately $10,500 a year.

Very truly, yours,
C. P. GRANDFIELD,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, this makes a total increase of $135,925.60, and if you deduct from this the $72,500 saved in salaries of agents and rent, you have an increased expense of at least $63,425.60 each year, to say nothing of the inconvenience to the pensioners and the great delay which the proposed change would cause in making the payments. I ask you to look a little further into the cost of paying pensioners from the city of Washington as compared with the cost of paying them from the city of Topeka, Kans. It costs in clerk hire to pay each of the 111,508 pensioners who are paid from the Topeka agency just 38.2 cents, while it costs to pay each of the 53,640 paid from the Washington agency just 51.9 cents, and if you include the expense of paying the 4,709 examining surgeons from the city of Washington and the contingent expenses, all of which should be charged and considered against the Washington agency, the expense of paying each pensioner and examining surgeon from the Washington agency is just 58 cents or nearly 20 cents more than its costs to pay each pensioner from the Topeka, Kans., agency, and 6 cents per capita more than it costs to pay from the Concord agency, which is next highest to Washington in the cost to make pension payments. If it is a question of economy, then you should pay all the pensioners from Topeka; by so doing $132,529.18 would be saved each year, but if the convenience of the soldiers is to be considered, then the payments should be continued under the present plan, but each agency should be raised to the high standard of the Topeka agency, which would result in the work being done with more speed and less expense than at present. Each clerk at the Topeka agency handles the papers of 2,859 pensioners, while each clerk at the Washington agency handles the papers for only 2,235 pensioners.

To change the present plan and make all payments from Washington would be to subject 99 out of every 100 pensioners to delay and inconvenience. The delay would be at least from three hours and twenty-five minutes to those who now receive their pensions at Philadelphia to one hundred and four hours for those who receive their pensions at San Francisco. Another question of delay and inconvenience which has not been considered is the return of the vouchers on account of defects in execution. There are errors in at least 5 per cent of the vouchers executed.

There is another thing which should be considered, and that is the clerks at the various agencies own their own homes and are comfortably situated, and it would be unfair to compel them to come to Washington, where the expense of living is much higher. The homes and friends these men and women have made are dear to them, and they should not be compelled to give them up just to help swell the pay rolls of Washington, and that is what consolidation means, no more and no less.

There is another point, and that is thousands of old soldiers live in the cities or adjoining the cities where the pension agencies are located, and they call in person at the agency, or at the post-office, for their checks and so receive them on pension day, each quarter. To bring the agencies to Washington would compel these men to send their vouchers in by mail and in some cases to wait for days for their return. The greatest objection, however, is that the Government is already trying to do too much business from bureaus in this city, business that should be done in various sections of the country. It would be much better to have the pension agencies where they are and distribute the business of some of the other bureaus out among the States than to consolidate everything in the city of Washington. The change would cut down the expenses of the Government and the people would know more about our institutions and the workings of our great Departments.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will vote against the consolidation of pension agencies when the question comes up.

MOTHERS' DAY.

Mr. BURKETT. I offer a resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Sunday, May 10, 1908, be recognized as Mothers' Day, and that it be observed as such by the Members and officers and employees of the United States Senate wearing a white flower in honor of their mothers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the resolution go over.

Mr. KEAN. Let it be read again.

Mr. LODGE. It has gone over.

Mr. KEAN. No matter, if the resolution has gone over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will again be read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. CLAPP. I rise to an amendment.

Mr. KEAN. Let the resolution go over.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to amend it by adding——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection has been made to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CLAPP. Very well.

Mr. BURKETT. Who made the objection, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asked that the resolution go over.

JAMES KANE.

Mr. BULKELEY. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1159) to correct the military record of James Kane, to submit a favorable report (No. 631), and I ask unanimous consent that the Senate consider the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the bill go over. It may be called up later.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the Senate take up the agricultural appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19158) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, yesterday the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] called my attention to a certain matter which I had not intended to present or consider, and I replied as I understood the facts to be. This matter that I refer to was published some time ago, and last evening a gentleman called my attention to an extract from a paper of this city, containing a statement from the President; and I think, in justice to the President, it ought to be inserted in the RECORD, as it is explanatory of the President's action. As I do not care to read it, I will ask that the Secretary read from the slip of paper all that follows the heading "The President's reasons."

Mr. CLAPP. What paper is it from?

Mr. TELLER. I think it is from the Washington Star, but I am not quite certain. It was handed to me last night. I never saw it before. It is evidently an authentic statement from the President, and I think it ought to be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

In signing the proclamation the President added the following memorandum explaining his action:

"These forest reserves were determined upon and the preparation of the necessary papers ordered some months ago—in two-thirds of the cases some years ago—in the exercise of the duty imposed upon me by act of Congress of March 3, 1891. The utmost care and deliberation have been exercised in deciding upon the boundaries of the proposed reserves; in all but a very few cases long-continued and detailed field examinations have been made, and in the remainder examinations amply sufficient to justify the proposed action.

"The necessary proclamations under existing law now come before me, and the question is presented whether I should refrain from acting under the existing law because there is now under consideration by Congress a proposal to change the law so as to require Congressional action upon the establishing of such forest reserves. If I did not act, reserves which I consider very important for the interests of the United States would be wholly or in part dissipated before Congress has an opportunity again to consider the matter, while under the action which I propose to take they will be preserved; and if Congress differs from me in this opinion it will have full opportunity in the future to take such position as it may desire anent the discontinuance of the reserves by affirmative action, taken with the fullest opportunity for considering the subject by itself and on its own merits.

"If by any chance land were valuable for other purposes than for forest reserves is shown to have been included in these reserves, I shall forthwith restore it to entry.

"Failure on my part to sign these proclamations would mean that immense tracts of valuable timber would fall into the hands of the lumber syndicates before Congress has an opportunity to act; whereas the creation of the reserves means that this timber will be kept in the interest of the home maker; for our entire purpose in this forest-reserve policy is to keep the land for the benefit of the actual settler and home maker, to further his interests in every way, and, while using the natural resources of the country for the benefit of the present generation, also to use them in such manner as to keep them unimpaired for the benefit of the children now growing up to inherit the land. This is the final and exclusive object not merely of our forest policy, but of our whole public-land policy.

"THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

"THE WHITE HOUSE, March 2, 1907."

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I accept the President's explanation as correct, of course.

Yesterday there was some question as to the expenditures out of the lump sum, and I presented what I supposed to be the correct figures. I have since looked over the publication of the Government, and I find that I did not make any mistake.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I may say that when the Senator from Colorado presented the figures yesterday, as they differed from those I had before me, I asked him if he was sure about them, without of course presuming to differ with him. Afterwards I informed myself. The provisions appear in different places in the report. The Senator is undoubtedly correct. He was correct practically yesterday in the figures.

Mr. TELLER. I will repeat the figures, so that Senators may have them. I could not put my hand on them yesterday.

On page 296 of the Statement of Expenditures of the Department of Agriculture you will find for the Forest Service statutory salaries, $112,133.16, that is what I gave yesterday; lump-fund salaries, in Washington, $259,657.58; outside of Washington, $817,199.89. Those are the figures I gave yesterday, and I now present them from the report of the Government. I find them in another sort of a reduced account.

Mr. President, I do not exactly understand this, and while I do not want to open up a discussion over it, I desire to call attention to it, and when some Senator who has greater knowledge comes to speak to the Senate I hope he will speak about it. I have before me Document No. 429, being Estimates of Expenditure for Department of Agriculture. On page 55 I find this:

General expenses, Forest Service, $3,051,900.

Then come the items:

Salaries in Washington, $403,095.
Salaries outside of Washington, $1,946,140.

I am not going to attempt to reconcile these two statements. I find myself quite incapable of reconciling the statistics of this Government as a general thing. I find in one statistical abstract one thing and I find in another publication of this Government an entirely different statement of what ought to be the same facts.

Mr. President, yesterday after I had concluded the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] presented a statement of lump funds. He said:

Mr. President, I have listened with interest this afternoon to a great deal of indignant eloquence about the wrongs of lump sums and sums left in the control of officers of the Departments to spend as they please.

And so forth.

He then cites a large number of lump sums. For instance, he says:

Bureau of Entomology, the statutory salaries are $19,443, and the lump-fund salaries, spent at the discretion and pleasure of the head of the Bureau, are $164,644; Bureau of Soils, statutory salaries $35,384, lump fund $83,178.

And so forth.

Mr. President, those are very different appropriations from this. For instance, you have a lump sum for the railway mail service and you have a lump sum for the rural delivery service and all that. But the lump sum we complain of here is left absolutely to the discretion of the head of the Department. Because we have been doing these illegal and improper things is no reason why we should continue them. For one, I have lifted my voice for several years against lump funds. They are virtually in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and if they are not, they are certainly not good administration.

Mr. President, yesterday the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] addressed the Senate on this question, and I want to call attention to his conclusion. On page 6110 of the RECORD of this morning I find he made this statement:

Sir, I trust that the amendment of the Senator from Idaho, prohibiting the transportation of wood out of any State, will be voted down, and that this appropriation, paid for already without taxation and without cost, will be passed as it came in the recommendation from the Secretary of Agriculture.

I wonder if the Senator from New York supposes that any money gets into our Treasury without taxation of somebody, except a small amount of money that gets in on the sale of property which we have already appropriated for a special and specific purpose. Every appropriation made here is made out of the tax money of this country.

The Senator also stated that this service had been managed with so much skill that it was self-supporting, or words to that effect. The bill here before us will show that that is not true, for there is a very large expenditure of money derived from the taxpayers of this country appropriated in this bill.

The Senator from New York also called attention to the great danger of the country going to the bad because of the loss of timber, and I notice he is the author of a bill for the purpose of establishing a national forest reserve on the Hudson River, a section of the country that has been settled for a couple of hundred years or more—two hundred and fifty years—and I suppose now, notwithstanding his eulogy of New York for what it has been doing in the forest business, he expects Congress to appropriate money to establish a reservation in the State of New York. But if the Government can do it in other sections, I suppose it can do it in New York.

I was struck with one statement the Senator made, and in looking over some of the forest-reserve literature last evening I found it repeated in several cases. Undoubtedly in the history of the world there was a country in Asia, of which Babylon was the capital for a time at least, and there were other large cities in the same neighborhood. The country was very thoroughly populated, and considering the time of the world in which the people lived, it was a very advanced civilizaton, the highest probably on the earth; and in some respects it was a very good civilization.

The Senator says that that country was turned into a desert—that the Arabian desert resulted from the fact that they had cut off the timber. I claim to be something of a student of history. I have spent all the time I reasonably could give in an examination of the history of that section of the world, and have read all the histories extant with respect to it. It is a very interesting thing. It is the cradle of the race, and it is somewhat interesting to a student of history to know that at least forty-five hundred years before the birth of Christ there was a civilization there that had reduced the relations of men to a code, and had determined practically what they should do and what they should not do, even to the extent of inheritance.

I find that at least forty-five hundred years before Christ there was, in that country, a law with relation to the inheritance by the wife that was practically that of the State of New York when I was 21 years old. I do not know what the New York law is now. It has been said that civilization could be measured by its treatment of women; and here, way back in the dark ages, as we have supposed, a wise provision, as wise as now exists in many of the States, was in operation with repect to inheritance by women. The woman took practically the same relation to the property that the woman took in New York in 1840 and in 1850. And her property rights were better protected by law than it was in New York.

Mr. President, there is not a scrap of evidence anywhere that that was ever a timbered country. It may have been, but if so the timber had been removed before there is any history of that country at all. I do not know how far back history will go. We thought a few years ago that three or four or five hundred years before the Christian era—a thousand years at the most—was as far as we would ever get. Within the last twenty years there have been unearthed, in that section of the country, tablets of two kinds, that which they call the cylinder tablet, which is rolled up, and that which is just in the shape of that book [exhibiting] when I lay it down. The tablets are made of clay, and they are practically indestructible. The only difficulty the scientists have now is to determine when the tablets were made and when they were deposited.

The learned people of the world have concluded that they can go back forty-five hundred years before the Christian era; and as early as twenty-eight hundred years before the Christian era you can know just as much about Babylon and its affairs as you can know about old Rome five hundred years before the Christian era. You can go back to the very earliest notice of mankind in these tablets and you will find that that was a country of irrigation. The exploits of kings are recorded in these tablets, because the tablets were largely inscribed by the kings themselves or their secretaries, and more frequent than are notes of their exploits in war are the statements of services in opening up canals or cleaning out old ones or fixing up the banks when they were destroyed, in order to aid the irrigation of the country. It was not a timbered country then; and when the highest civilization that ever existed in Babylon or any other part of the Asiatic world existed in its greatest strength and glory there were no forests within 500 miles of that country.

That has been repeated ad nauseam by these people who are attempting to alarm the people of the United States about the water of this country. The Tigris and the Euphrates and a half a dozen other rivers that may be named are just as good to-day in all probability as they were five thousand years ago. The mountains that furnished the water then furnish it still. They do not now furnish to the unfortunate inhabitants of that country water for irrigation. Why? Because in the course of time, with the destruction of the settlements by war and by bad government, the canals have gradually filled up until almost all of them are full of débris, first, I suppose, by the silt that naturally came down from the rivers, and later by the drifting sands, and the lack of attention. Every man who has lived in an irrigating country, whether it is in Egypt or Colorado, knows that every few years you have to clean out your ditches. If you do not, they will fill up with the sediment that is found in the water.

An English officer, really an engineer, recently made a report on that country, and he stated that with $20,000,000 he would put it in the same fruitful condition that it was in the days of Babylon's glory, and there is now being considered in England that very question, whether it would pay for that country to be seized and old canals to be opened and new ones dug. They would undoubtedly find as much water in the Euphrates and the Tigris and those other rivers as was ever found in them. At all events, the engineer says there is an abundance of water now, if it were only spread over the land.

Mr. President, it is not worth while for anybody to go into hysterics over the question whether we are going to use up the forests so that we will not have any water, or whether we are going to use up the coal so that we will not have any heat. In the history of the world until recently coal was not a very important item of value. It is only when the use of steam in producing power was discovered that coal came into any great value. It might have been used in a few kitchens and a few homes in England before that time, but it was of no earthly consequence, and wood was the fuel, of course.

To-day we are mining an immense amount of coal in this country. I think we are mining about 300,000,000 tons a year, as I recollect, of bituminous coal, and about 60,000,000 tons of anthracite coal. I believe that is about right, although I am speaking from memory and not from looking it up, which I usually do. It is my habit when I am going to make a statement to look at the record, but I have it not before me, and so I do not bother with it.

Mr. President, that is a great deal of coal, but when some man stands up and tells you that in a few years the supply of coal will be exhausted in the United States he either does not know the amount of coal we have here or he does not intend to be fair in his statement. I find the statement in these publications that the coal will in a few years be exhausted. I made a calculation of the coal in Colorado a few years ago from the number of acres that I believed then it was possible to be mined. I took only a single vein of coal, and I know that much of Colorado has five veins of coal in it, and the same probably is true of other sections of the country.

I could figure it up and show that at the rate we were using coal in Colorado that will furnish Colorado with coal for more than two thousand years, and by that time we will have learned some method of getting along without coal, I am pretty sure. At all events, I do not think the present generation should refrain from using coal for fear that the supply might be exhausted in the next two thousand years.

Mr. President, I have disposed of some of these statements that I call "hysterical." I do not mean to be offensive to anybody. I am not referring to the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], of course, but to the hysterical statements made in these publications. They go out and the people read them and the people become frightened. I can remember that twenty-five years ago there was a fright in England, and a great fright, over the fear that the supply of coal would be exhausted in a few years, and they are still mining coal in England.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 74) suspending the commodity clause of the present interstate-commerce law.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I want to say a word or two about power in this country. In my judgment the time is not far distant when the power in this country will not be steam, but it will be electricity. Of course electrical power has been long coming. It was predicted away back in the forties that electricity would be the final power. It met with many reverses. Away back in the first settlement in Colorado—or, at least, as early as 1866 or 1867—it was attempted to use electricity in the city of Denver to run street cars. It was attempted in other sections of the country, and it was a practical failure. They did not find how to do it. It was too expensive, and it was somewhat dangerous. Now, there is not a large city in the United States that is not running street cars by electricity. There is not a city in the United States that is not running machinery by electricity. It is found to be cheaper everywhere than coal. It is cleaner and safer and, what is the main thing to be considered in securing power, it is cheaper.

If we were to harness the rivers in this country, as we are now beginning to do, in a few years nobody would use coal except for heating in houses, and I prophesy that it will not be twenty-five years before the cities of this country will not only be as they are now lighted by electricity, but they will be heated by electricity, and electricity, in most cases, will be created not by coal, but by water power.

On the great rivers of this country, especially in the mountain regions, you can create electricity so that it will not cost more than 25 per cent of what it will cost to create it with coal. That will give a great opportunity for the manufacturing and productive enterprises of the country. Up in New England a very large number of factories are now run by water. It will be only a few years before water will be used to create electricity, and they will be run by electricity and not by water. Last year, in the State of Colorado, a company organized somewhere back East—because they have more money there than we have; I do not know that I have ever known exactly where it was organized—came into our country and attempted and are now going on with an enterprise to establish a great electric power. They are using one of our rivers that is running to the sea without any benefit to mankind, and they have a plant laid out that will probably cost them fifteen or twenty million dollars. They expect to send electricity not only all over Colorado, but into the adjoining States.

There has been recently discovered, within the last ten or fifteen years, at least, by a certain method that I am not scientific enough to explain to the Senate, a method by which you can send electricity so far, and then, by what they call a "relay," you can send it so much farther, and you can certainly send the power from Niagara to New York City, 400 miles, at least.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. In answer to the Senator from Colorado, I wish to say that there is no question but electricity can be and is now transmitted 400 miles.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; I think that is done now.

Mr. SMOOT. We have a circuit in our State of nearly 300 miles, and the electricity is used for lighting purposes from almost the northern limit of our State to the southern end of Utah County.

Mr. TELLER. I do not pretend to know about the development in the neighboring States, but I do know that Utah is rich in water power. I know that Utah can create more electricity than she will ever use, and she will have it to sell to other sections where they are not as favorably situated as they are in Utah, because the mountain streams furnish the best power that there is.

Mr. President, I tried to demonstrate the other day that the control of the water of a State is absolutely in the State and not in the General Government, and I am brought to that because the General Government now is asserting the right to control the water. When we had a land convention last summer the President of the United States sent a letter to the convention which I could read here. I have it, but I do not care about taking the time to read it. I will simply make the statement.

The President said it had been charged that the Government through its Forest Service and Reclamation Service was going to attempt to control the water power, the irrigating power, and all that. The President rather denied that, and I have never charged that the President ever had an idea of that until recently when we got a message the other day, a letter I believe written to the chairman of the committee, saying that hereafter when we dam a river, we should provide that the dam should be put up within a certain time and then we should provide some charge for the use of the water.

Mr. President, it is very proper and appropriate for the State to make such a charge if it wants to do so. I do not myself know of any State that has ever attempted to charge for water power. If they have done so I do not know where it is. They do not do it in New England. They do not do it in New York, unless they have done it within the last two or three years.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FULTON. I simply want to ask the Senator for his views on the proposition as to the existence of any power in the General Government to exact rental or payment for the use of water. In other words, my understanding of the relations between the States and the General Government is that the States own the water absolutely for all and every purpose, except subject to the right of the General Government to regulate commerce.

Mr. TELLER. On the water.

Mr. FULTON. On the water.

Mr. TELLER. I went over that the other day and I do not care to go over it extensively now except to say——

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. DEPEW. In regard to the suggestion the Senator made about New York having taken no action in reference to a charge for water rights by way of franchise or otherwise, there is no law in our State on the subject, but Governor Hughes announced at the commencement of the present session of the legislature that he would sign no bill granting water rights or franchises for the use of water unless there was a clause in it that the State should be paid.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I would not have said positively that New York had not provided a tax, but I knew New York had not unless recently, and I do not believe any State in the Union has provided a tax on water power.

I presented, I think, twenty-five or thirty cases—I could present as many more—where the Supreme Court have said without any question that the water of a State belongs to the State, even of navigable streams, and the land under the river belongs to the State.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not generally known that the Forest Service claims the right to appropriate the waters of the streams in the State. So I will ask the indulgence of the Senator from Colorado that I may read a telegram received this week from the State engineer of Idaho setting forth the position which the Forest Service takes. It is as follows:

[Telegram.]

BOISE, IDAHO, May 2, 1908.

W. B. HEYBURN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Forest Supervisor Grand-Jean February 6 last filed applications on following creeks: Huckleberry, Greenhorn, Shake, Long Gulch, Paradise, Deer, Dooley, Lick, Beaver, Wilson, Boulder, Iron, Garfield, Eight Mile, Silver, Warm Spring. Also on North Fork of East Fork and North Fork of Wood River. Quantities claimed vary from 1 to 3 second feet, apparently to be used for irrigation of small tracts near ranger stations in Boise, Blaine, Elmore, and Custer counties. Grand-Jean said it was not desired applications should be treated as in ordinary cases, but should simply be considered as formal notice that the Forest Service intended to appropriate the waters. It was insisted by this department that they pass through usual routine, and February 13 they were returned to Grand-Jean for completion and fees. He was still doubtful whether State water law must be complied with, and said would take matter up with his superior, Mr. Pollock, at Salt Lake. Since then have heard nothing from applications, although State law requires return here in sixty days to hold right.

JAS. STEPHENSON, Jr.,
State Engineer.

My intention in calling the telegram to the notice of the Senate at this time was to indicate the fact that the Forest Service is beginning to assert the right to control the waters in the streams of the State of Idaho, either through the process of making application on behalf of the Government of the United States or, as the Forester suggests, in a merely formal way, without feeling that they are called upon to comply with the laws of the State at all.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I suppose the Reclamation Service make their water filings in Idaho in such public work as they are doing in the way of reservoirs, and so forth?

Mr. HEYBURN. They have no right under the laws of Idaho to locate water at all. The Government of the United States is not given the right to locate water in the State of Idaho.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator misunderstands me, I think. They have the same rights as an individual or corporation to come in and locate and apply for water under the State laws, have they not?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; they have not. No municipal corporation, no government is given the right under either the constitution or the laws of Idaho to locate the streams or the water in the streams of Idaho under any circumstances at all.

Mr. WARREN. Is the Senator prepared to say either that there are no irrigation works going on or being constructed by the Government there, and water appropriated therefor, or, on the other hand, that his State has refused to recognize them and accord them the rights of water the same as it would accord to other people?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will not interfere with the Senator from Colorado, but I can answer that from the constitution of the State.

Mr. WARREN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Colorado further at this time.

Mr. TELLER. I should like very much to have the Senator answer it and then I will resume the floor.

Mr. WARREN. I was about to say I assume the Forestry Service could negotiate with the State as to the water the same as the Reclamation Service has done, but if the Senator says they have not been recognized there, I accept his statement. Other States, however, have recognized them, and they do business in other States regarding water rights the same as individuals and corporations do.

Mr. HEYBURN. Idaho has not raised the question against the reclamation project for the use of the water, because Idaho has such a surplus of water that it has not been necessary. There is now, however, a threatened contest between persons who have located water rights on the Snake River under the laws of the State and those who are claiming it for reclamation purposes. I do not care to anticipate it, but I should like——

Mr. WARREN. Is the Government engaged in reclamation service work in Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Now, have they made any application to secure any water rights therefor?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a question the court is going to be called on to determine should there be a scarcity of water. Should there not be a scarcity of water——

Mr. WARREN. Have they made any application for it?

Mr. TELLER. I think I will allow the Senator from Idaho to read his authority, and then I will resume the floor. Otherwise I will not get through to-day.

Mr. HEYBURN. This is the water law. I read from Article XV of the constitution of the State of Idaho.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator does not answer yes or no, whether the Government has or has not negotiated with the State in securing water.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not advised as to the steps that the Government has taken as to the reclamation project, and I have not found it yet necessary to take that up for consideration.

Article XV of the constitution of Idaho provides that—

The use of all waters now appropriated, or that may hereafter be appropriated, for sale, rental, or distribution; also of all waters originally appropriated for private use, but which after such appropriation has heretofore been, or may hereafter be, sold, rented, or distributed, is hereby declared to be a public use and subject to the regulation and control of the State in the manner prescribed by law.

That is section 1. There are a number of decisions of the Supreme Court that have construed it. That can not be controverted. We have no power to change that; it is the constitution of the State.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that that does not bear on the question where the United States Government owns the land, whether a forest reserve or anything else, and there is a stream in it. The Government of the United States stands in the position of a riparian proprietor and has all the rights of a riparian proprietor.

Mr. HEYBURN. I can answer the question in a minute. By the constitution it is expressly declared that riparian rights are abolished in Idaho.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIXON in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TELLER. I want the Senator to finish. I have the floor and I want to go on.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not want to intrude on the time of the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want other Senators to take the Senator's place just now.

Mr. HEYBURN. If it is agreeable, I will finish reading the section of the constitution of Idaho.

Mr. TELLER. Go on.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is as follows:

The right to collect rates or compensation for the use of water supplied to any county, city, or town, or water district, or the inhabitants thereof, is a franchise, and can not be exercised except by authority of and in the manner prescribed by law.

The right to divert and appropriate the unappropriated waters of any natural stream to beneficial uses shall never be denied. Priority of appropriation shall give the better right as between those using the water; but when the waters of any natural stream are not sufficient for the service of all those desiring the use of the same, those using the water for domestic purposes shall (subject to such limitations as may be prescribed by law) have the preference over those claiming for any other purpose. And those using the water for agricultural purposes shall have preference over those using the same for manufacturing purposes. And in any organized mining district those using the water for mining purposes or milling purposes connected with mining shall have preference over using the same for manufacturing or agricultural purposes. But the usages by such subsequent appropriators shall be subject to such provisions of law regulating the taking of private property for public and private use, as referred to in section 14 of Article I of this constitution.

Whenever any waters have been or shall be appropriated or used for agricultural purposes under a sale, rental, or distribution thereof, such sale, rental, or distribution shall be deemed an exclusive dedication to such use.

Then it provides that it can not shut off after the right has attached. Then it goes on to provide for the distribution of the water. That is the law which abrogates the old rule of riparian ownership, and the supreme court of Idaho has held in express terms that riparian ownership is abolished by virtue of those provisions of the constitution, and the title of water is only by appropriation in that State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I should like to proceed with some regularity if I can and get through. I can submit to questions and discussions, but if I do, it will be another all-day trip, and I do not want to do it.

Now, Mr. President, I want to answer the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. He says the Government of the United States has riparian rights. It does not have them in Colorado, nor do I think it has them in Idaho. The Supreme Court of the United States declared in the last important case, in Kansas v. Colorado, that the State has an unquestioned right to determine whether the riparian rights exist or do not. The Supreme Court has said again and again that the Government of the United States does not hold its land as a sovereign, but as a proprietor, and the Government of the United States must submit to the control of the State except as the State has declared it would not exercise certain powers—that is, the power of taxation, and would not interfere with the sale of land. Otherwise the Government is a proprietor just the same in the State of Colorado as I am on my farm, precisely.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Except in navigable streams.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Indiana says, "Except in navigable streams." Mr. President, the Government owns nothing in a navigable stream. The Supreme Court has said again and again that the Government has an easement over it. An easement does not convey a title. An easement is the right to occupy, to use. That is all the Government has, and in at least four or five cases the courts have said the United States has an easement over the water—that is, the right to control the navigation of it—and with that right goes what everybody will see was a proper right—to see that no one should destroy the navigation of the stream.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The only reason I made the remark——

Mr. TELLER. I did not find any objection about it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I know; but the Senator used the words "Federal Government," and said the Federal Government has no control over the streams. Of course I merely wanted to put in the exception. The Senator is quite right about it. We have absolute——

Mr. TELLER. If I said no control I did not mean to say that. I meant to say no right in the stream. The Government does have control of the navigable part of the stream.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Absolutely.

Mr. TELLER. Absolutely. You can not obstruct it.

Mr. President, I said one day here, and I think it is the law, that the State of Colorado can not obstruct a navigable stream. The United States can not do that either. It has been held in England that though the King owned the water and the soil, he could not interfere with navigation.

Now, Mr. President, I want to get back to the question raised by the Senator from Idaho. In the first place, if the State has the title to the water and the right to use it as it sees fit, provided it does not interfere with the navigation, then it follows, I think, beyond question, that if you use it for any purpose, for power or anything else, it is still under the control of the State. I have no doubt the State of Colorado could provide that any man using the water of the State for power purposes should pay a rental or a price for it, but the State has never done it. I repeat what I said before, no State ever did do that, because it is thought to be more beneficial to the State to have the powers created and the water used than it is to get a revenue from it. Besides, a revenue from the water used will always be a tax upon those using it. If you want to manufacture, it will add so much to the cost of manufacturing.

I believe the people of New England who are using the water from the Merrimac and other rivers would resent it any day if the State in which they find themselves should put a tax upon the water. They would not agree to it. It would to that extent hamper them in their efforts to produce.

But, Mr. President, I get back now to the question, Is the Government attempting to control the waters of the States? I do not know. I do not think the Government is doing it, in the proper sense of the term. I do not myself recognize the Executive as the Government. Mr. President, I am restive under it when some man tells me the Government of the United States does this because the President does it. I understand the Government of the United States consists of the legislative, the executive, and the judicial power, and the three bodies comprise the Government. The legislature is and has always been in all the history of the world the most important branch of any and every government where there were a free people attempting to administer a government.

This body and the other House might be said properly to be the Government—not in the full, technical sense, but in the common use that mankind makes of it. We are the people who make the laws; we are the people who declare the policies; we are the people who by our legislation encourage industries and protect them; and I want to say here it has been always an idea of mine that we have a right to do that according to our best judgment, within the Constitution.

Here is the statement made in 1907 by the Forest Bureau of the Government, and this I copied verbatim:

Area of forest reserves November 27, 1906, 127,000,000 acres—

That has been enlarged to about 151,000,000 acres—

Stumpage value of 330,000,000 feet of timber, at $2 per thousand, $660,000,000.

Statement of the present capitalized value of the forest reserves—to be found in the RECORD of February 18, 1907, page 3279:

Area forest reserves November 27, 1906, 127,078,658 acres.

1. Stumpage value of 330,000,000 feet of timber, at $2 per thousand	$660,000,000
2. 110,000,000 acres, capable of producing commercial forest, at $1 per acre	110,000,000
3. 110,000,000 acres of range for grazing live stock, at 1½ cents per acre (capitalized at 5 per cent)	30,000,000
4. 83,000,000 acre-feet of water for irrigation purposes, at 10 cents per acre-foot (capitalized at 5 per cent)	166,000,000
5. 3,000,000 horsepower, capable of being developed from water in reserves, at $10 per horsepower (capitalized at 5 per cent)	600,000,000
6. Estimated value of occupancy and use of reserve land, products, and resources additional to the above	5,000,000
7. Permanent improvements now on the reserves, roads, trails, cabins, telephones, etc	5,000,000
Total	1,576,000,000
Less 10 per cent for private holdings	157,600,000

I have no doubt it is worth it, but I do not believe it can be an asset to the Government of the United States, except so far as the public land goes.

One hundred and ten million acres capable of producing commercial forests at a dollar per acre. That is, when the Government has planted 110,000,000 acres it may be worth $110,000,000. One-third, I believe, of this great forest reserve has no timber on it. We had in Colorado for years, and I do not know but we yet have, whole townships of reservations upon which I would guarantee, with a four-horse team, to carry away every stick on it. There is not even brush there, Mr. President.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. TELLER. I yield; yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want to ask the Senator whether it is not a fact that on the reservation of which he speaks there was originally timber, and that it has been burned off or cut off or otherwise destroyed?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, on the ground of which I speak there never was any timber in the history of mankind. If there was any timber there, it was before the settlement of the American continent. No. What I refer to is not ground from which the timber has been cut off or burned off, but ground that never grew any timber and never will, unless it is planted and cared for by the hand of man.

I have had some experience in timber raising. I am somewhat given to fads, I confess. When our farmers used to say to me, "We can not raise timber on the prairies under the timber-culture act," I would say, "I think you can; but you are too indolent or too careless; you do not try."

I would not state this if it did not exactly illustrate what I am going to say, because I do not believe in bringing in personal matters. Having some land on the Arkansas River, I went down there and took up a timber claim—the only claim—not for gain, but to prove my theory as to raising trees without irrigation. Under the law I was to cultivate 5 acres of that land the first year; then 5 acres perhaps two years later—I do not remember—and then, when I should have succeeded in cultivating 10 acres for five years, I would be entitled to the land by paying $1.25 an acre for it. I could have bought it for $1.25 an acre. When I took it up it had been offered for sale and had been returned. But I wanted to try the experiment. I plowed 10 acres; I fenced it with a good pine board fence; I made some ditches, so that when the water on the sides of the hills ran down after a storm, as it would do, it would run in on the 10 acres. I not only plowed it, but I cross-plowed it. I then set out 700 trees per acre, as the law requires. I had a man who was a Scotchman, a tree man, to take care of them. In June he wrote me that the trees were doing finely; that they were in fine shape; but about August he wrote me that every tree on those 5 acres was dead.

That was rather a setback to my theory. When I returned the next spring I went down there. I plowed the land over again. I plowed it, and cross-plowed it. I dug 700 holes to the acre—I hired men to do that—and I went down with a wagon to the river bottom and pulled up the little trees, of which there were millions growing along where it was moist near the river—little cottonwood trees, native trees. I took them up, put them in the ground, put barrels in a wagon, hauled water, and put a pail of water into every hole where I put a tree; and I would have guaranteed against anybody in the world that I would secure a forest in that way. At first the trees grew beautifully, but when September came and I got home, I went down to look at them, and found there was not a live leaf on any one of the trees. Then I abandoned the experiment.

I do not like to put in personal matters of this kind, but I wanted to illustrate this. As I have said, you can not raise trees in that region without water.

I ought to add one other word. I figured up what the experiment cost me, and I found that I was out $1,100, and I did not have a bush. That is the condition under which the Government is going to raise trees. It is possible there may be other sections where the conditions may be more favorable, but I doubt it.

Mr. FRYE. What is the reason why the trees would not grow?

Mr. TELLER. They would not grow because of the burning sun and the dry winds that swept all the moisture out of the land. They did grow and they would grow beautifully along the river where the seepage of the river came, and they would grow along the stream from which I took them. I got them on a little stream. Later I planted a good many thousands of trees along the stream; but I planted them where there was seepage along the river, and there they grew and are still growing on that piece of land, and higher up on the land, that I happened to own.

When the Government comes to planting trees it is opening up a great expense, but if it could make trees grow that did not cost more than three or four dollars apiece, I do not know that I should complain. I have planted trees and have them growing that cost me a good deal more than that. I have on my farm a beautiful ash grove, one of the finest that there is in the State; but it cost me more money than ten times what the trees are worth. So it will be with the Government. You can not raise trees there except you have irrigation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. TELLER. I will yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado as to what he attributed the failure of his experiment? Did he have the soil examined chemically to find out its composition?

Mr. TELLER. I did not examine the soil. If I had had an irrigation ditch to put water on the land the trees would have grown. That soil is of such a character that you can raise anything upon it that can be raised in that climate—corn, wheat, oats, barley, and beets. Plenty of land is of the same character, which under irrigation ditches would raise great crops. It is simply that you can not get water enough out of the sky. We are supposed to have in the State of Colorado in a year 14 inches of rain. There are places in Colorado where the rainfall is but 4 inches, instead of 14 inches.

Now, if the 14 inches should be spread out at the proper time, you could raise a crop, but if the 14 inches of water come in December and you did not get any more until the following December, of course you could not raise a crop under such conditions. When you raise a crop in Colorado without irrigation, it depends upon the season. Some seasons you can raise a fine crop. I have myself raised in Colorado 45 bushels of wheat to the acre with water. Of course without water I could not have raised a bushel, and would not have had any. The whole crop might be burnt up the next year if that did not happen to be a fortunate year.

That brings me back to the question of the inclusion of these forest timber lands. Every act that I know of has been for the reservation of land upon which trees were growing, and I deny the right to-day of the Department to include in such reservations any nontimber lands.

I want to read, in connection with this question, the statutes. Here is an act of Congress which may be found in the statute approved June 4, 1897, volume 30, page 36. After providing for forest reservations, it reads:

Nothing herein shall be construed as prohibiting the egress or ingress of actual settlers residing within the boundaries of such reservations, or from crossing the same to and from their property or homes; and such wagon roads and other improvements may be constructed thereon as may be necessary to reach their homes and to utilize their property under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. Nor shall anything herein prohibit any person from entering upon such forest reservations for all proper and lawful purposes, including that of prospecting, locating, and developing the mineral resources thereof: Provided, That such persons comply with the rules and regulations covering such forest reservations.

On February 1, 1905, we made this provision in the act providing for the transfer of forest reserves from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture, approved February 1, 1905 (Stat. L., vol. 33, p. 628):

SEC. 4. That rights of way for the construction and maintenance of dams, reservoirs, water plants, ditches, flumes, pipes, tunnels, and canals, within and across the forest reserves of the United States, are hereby granted to citizens and corporations of the United States for municipal or mining purposes, and for the purposes of the milling and reduction of ores, during the period of their beneficial use, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and subject to the laws of the State or Territory in which said reserves are respectively situated.

Will any lawyer here assert that when that grant was made to the people of Colorado the executive power in this country was given the right to charge them for running a right of way across a forest reserve? Was not that an absolutely free grant? It was so understood by those who passed it, and it was so understood by the people for whom it was enacted.

In every section of the country the Department is claiming that they must secure the right of way across these lands, and the Department insists on charging whatever it pleases. I have a letter before me showing that a man who desired to run a pipe line for water was required to pay $100 to the Government every year before he was allowed to do it. I want to call attention to this extract:

Eighty-three million acre-feet of water for irrigating purposes, at 10 cents per acre—

Now, there is a declaration on the part of the Forest Service that the right to charge 10 cents an acre for water for watering the land in the arid regions is one of the assets of the Government of the United States.

The other day a question arose between the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and myself as to the provisions of the reclamation act. I did not have it at hand then, but I have it now, and I want to read the seventh section. I asserted that under that law the Department could not irrigate private land nor interfere with it. It provides:

SEC. 7. That where in carrying out the provisions of this act it becomes necessary to acquire any rights or property—

That is, in carrying out the provisions of this act—

That where in carrying out the provisions of this act it becomes necessary to acquire any rights or property, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to acquire the same for the United States by purchase or by condemnation under judicial process, and to pay from the reclamation fund the sums which may be needed for that purpose, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States upon every application of the Secretary of the Interior, under this act, to cause proceedings to be commenced for condemnation within thirty days from the receipt of the application at the Department of Justice.

That is for the purpose of condemning the right of way over private land. I do not believe that the Government of the United States, even in connection with reclamation projects, has the right to do that. We have a State law under which the Government can proceed if it becomes necessary. There is no authority given to purchase land for the purpose of irrigating under this act.

Mr. WARREN. It would, of course, include reservoir sites with ditch rights.

Mr. TELLER. I presume so; yes, reservoirs. The eighth section of this act is somewhat instructive. It was put in the act by the Western people, and those who know the history of the act and how it was drawn know very well that it was put in by those who represented the arid regions. I want to say here that if it had not been in that bill would never have become a law, for we would never have accepted it without this provision:

SEC. 8. That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intended to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of any State or Territory relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation, or any vested right acquired thereunder, and the Secretary of the Interior, in carrying out the provisions of this act, shall proceed in conformity with such laws, and nothing herein shall in any way affect any right of any State or of the Federal Government or of any landowner, appropriator, or user of water in, to, or from any interstate stream or the waters thereof: Provided, That the right to the use of water acquired under the provisions of this act shall be appurtenant to the land irrigated, and beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of the right.

That last proviso was put in in the Senate of the United States. It is absolutely useless and worthless, because the States will determine whether the water is attached to the land or not; and the States have determined that, some of the States saying it is attached to the land, and some saying it is not. So far as I am concerned, I should always be glad to see it attached to the land; but that does not change the State law. In Colorado it is not attached to the land by the State law and by the decision of the supreme court of the State.

I know it is not very popular for a man to complain, and I do not want to weary the Senate with complaints. I recall the first few lines of an old hymn that they used to sing when I was a boy:

He who has nothing to give but tears,
Will weep alone.

He will not find any sympathy or help, but he will weep alone. I know that complaints generally tire and weary, but that they are sometimes necessary.

I called attention yesterday to a case where the Department was requiring a man after he had proved upon his land under the law to further prove. In looking over his letter to me this morning, I thought I would read just a word or two in it. It is from Mr. Roller, who is a prominent citizen of my State and a gentleman whom I have known for many years. He is a man of as high character as any State can produce, a man of means, and of great intelligence. He complains that after he had complied with the law, a sheepherder came around, who did not know a mine from a well, and went with him and looked over the work on ground where they were applying for a patent, and told him it was all right.

The herder went back and made a report, and the Government notified Mr. Roller that the report was adverse to his patent. Thereupon he applied, as I said yesterday, for a copy of the report, which they declined to give. They did say to him that the herder said he thought there was not enough work done on the claim, although all the law requires is $500 on a claim. Then I applied to the Department for a copy of this report, which they declined to give me, although I offered to pay for it. It was not the custom and usage of the Department to give out such reports. This is what Mr. Roller writes me:

The question at issue, as to whether myself and associates are to have patents or not, is a very serious one, as it involves not only the group of claims named in our present case, but two other groups in the same locality and but a short distance away. Upon these three groups some 12,000 feet of shaft, tunnels, and drifts have been run—representing an expenditure of nearly $100,000 in labor and cash, said three groups being worth at least $300,000, and the one directly in question at least $120,000.

I will guarantee that is a correct statement—

It is incomprehensible to us how the Department or the officials of the Land Office can claim these lands are not mineral, in the face of such facts as these, for it is hardly reasonable to suppose that mining men in Colorado would expend such an amount of labor and cash on ground not mineral.

The work is there and shows for itself.

The man who locates his land will probably know, as well as one of the forest rangers, whether it will pay him to spend a large amount of money upon it.

I think I have wearied the Senate, but I want the Senate to understand that this is a matter of grave concern to the people of the West. It means, if this system is adopted and persisted in, that practically all the land in Colorado, except the dry, arid plains, will be withdrawn from occupation and use. Many acres of these forest reserves, I know, can not be made into homes. Many acres of them are on the mountain tops; but one-fourth of all the State is now—and it is one of the largest States in the Union—in a forest reserve, and not an acre of it was ever brought into a forest reserve at the request of the officials of that State.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. CARTER. I inquire of the Senator from Colorado if he has presented an amendment prohibiting any question by the forest ranger or supervisor as to the bona fides of any mining claim unless where it is manifest that the purpose of securing title to the claim is to obtain the timber?

Mr. TELLER. I have not offered such an amendment, but I shall be glad to see it offered by somebody; but any opposition to the administration of these forest reserves is held all over the country as opposition to the principle of the reserve itself. While I do have opposition to many of the reserves, the principle I have not been combating at all, except in so far as it has been abused.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I think the effort of the forest rangers to question the judgment of a miner as to either the value of his claim or its prospects when developed imposes upon the Government a useless burden of expense, and likewise constitutes a severe punishment to the miners seeking title to mining ground. There are cases, no doubt, where placer claims, or, in some instances, even quartz claims, may be located with the obvious purpose of securing title to timber growing upon the surface of the claim rather than with any purpose of developing minerals, but those cases are very few in number and easily detected.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, I simply want to say that I am in entire accord with the views expressed by the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Montana in reference to the plan now carried on by forest reserves of examining mining claims. I think it has been altogether too technical. On the other hand, I want to call the attention of Senators to the fact that in one case in California some 10,000 acres of the best timber lands in that State were taken up under placer-mining claims, and would have been acquired by a combination of men purely for the timber, and not for the minerals, if it had not been for the management of the forest reserve in investigating those claims and showing that they were fraudulent.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, in the case cited by the Senator from California there was an effort made, which was very clear on the face of the record, viewed in connection with the appearance of the land, to perpetrate a fraud on the Government of employing the placer-mining law for a purpose not intended by the law. I would not deprive the forest supervisors or the rangers or the managers of the right, but would rather impose upon them the duty of detecting and preventing frauds of that kind; but the present view of the management is that the forest ranger or supervisor is in duty bound to contest the application of every miner for a mining claim within a forest reserve.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. CARTER. I am not prepared to say——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. As I understand, Mr. President, the Forest Service does not pass on the title to mining claims. That is done by the Interior Department.

Mr. CARTER. That is where the matter should be attended to.

Mr. SMOOT. And that, Mr. President, is where it is finally passed upon.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Department of the Interior, through the General Land Office, is the proper jurisdiction in which the matter of a man's right to a mining claim ought to be settled; but, under pay of the Government and at Government expense, it seems to be the determined purpose of the Forest Service to contest the application of every man who applies for a title to a mining claim within a forest reserve and thus put the individual to the expense of procuring witnesses, paying their expenses, having testimony reduced to writing, and preparing a large record upon an issue raised by the Government against a claimant who is required under existing law and rules and regulations to make an ample showing before the General Land Office, as it is.

What I insist upon is that where there is no timber growing upon a mining claim, thus making it clear that the purpose of securing the title to the mining claim can not be to secure title to the timber, it should be no part of the duty of a forest supervisor to question the judgment or good faith of the individual whose labor and toil give the highest evidence of good faith in the performance of the requisite $500 worth of mining before he can secure a patent.

Mr. TELLER. Especially if he has done $100,000 worth of work.

Mr. CARTER. I know of many cases that have been called to my attention, where long controversies have been provoked upon the claim by forest reserve rangers bringing on contests with persons who had applied under the law for patents to their claims, without any possible benefit to the forest and without any possible benefit to the Government of the United States, because the individual getting title to 20 acres of land on the side of a bleak mountain, upon which he hopes at some time to develop a mine of value, paying $5 per acre for the surface, is certainly a matter of no great loss to the Government, but it may prove of some benefit to the individual.

Mr. SMOOT. I undertake to say——

Mr. TELLER. I think I will resume the floor and finish my remarks and let the Senator go on after that.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Colorado in any way.

Mr. TELLER. My experience yesterday leads me to think that if I am to get through within any reasonable time I ought to go on now.

I do not object to the suggestion made by the Senator from Montana—that I should offer an amendment to this bill. I have named only two or three cases. I could load up the RECORD with them. I could produce the affidavits of men who have been complaining. As the Senator from Montana says, there seems to be a determined effort to make it just as distressing as possible for the man who is on a forest reserve, and that exists whether he is a settler or a miner.

A mining claim in most of the districts in my State is 300 feet wide by 1,500 feet long. In some of the new counties it is 600 by 1,500. I think in this county it is 300 by 1,500. There can be no claim that the applicant is trying to get the timber. I will venture to say that if there ever was any timber on the claim it was cut off and put into the mine long ago.

I would not have detained the Senate on this matter, but I know that Senators who have no connection with the mining section know nothing about the trouble we are having. There have been no frauds on the Government in mining claims, so far as I know, and I am fairly familiar with every mining camp in the State of Colorado, which has an area of a hundred thousand square miles. There is not a camp in the State in which I have not been; there is not a camp in the State where I do not know some of the people. I have had a large experience in mining matters, both as a miner and as an attorney at law.

When a man gets a mining claim upon which he spends ten or fifteen or twenty thousand dollars—I know it, because I have in my mind many people who have done that—and gets practically to the end of his own bank account, he wants to call upon somebody to assist him. Then he wants a patent. He can not get a patent with all this red tape. The law is clear and explicit. He must prove that he has a shaft on a vein. I am not speaking now of placer claims, because we worked those out years ago. He must prove he has a vein. He must then prove he has done a certain amount of work—$500 worth—on the claim. He does that by Government officials—engineers—who are licensed to determine those questions. I do not believe anybody could find in the State of Colorado a mining claim that did not have a vein in it, unless it was located by somebody too ignorant to know a vein when he saw it. People do not take mining claims for any ulterior purpose. The land is not valuable enough and the timber is not valuable enough to justify a man in expending the three or four hundred dollars which it costs to survey it. They never do it. Thousands of men never yet have been able to get patents for their claims because they have not been able to get enough out of the mine to pay for working it.

The Department now holds—and that is one of the things it insists upon—that the mine must be a paying mine. Many of the best mines in the State of Colorado were patented before they ever paid a dollar, and they never would have been patented if their owners had to establish the fact that they were paying mines before they got the patents. They got their patents and then they were prepared to go on and put in their money, and not risk it without a patent. Then they found the ore.

Almost everybody who gets into the mining business wishes to get out of it, but it is very attractive so long as the prospect of a good mine is held out. But I have no doubt there are a hundred mines in Colorado that have not paid where there is one that has paid any considerable amount of money. Of course when you find a mine which turns out immense fortunes within a few days it stimulates everybody else. There was a mine in the neighborhood of Leadville which at one time was ready to be abandoned, and the people who were working it would have abandoned it if they had not been men of means, and it produced in ten hours' work $118,000. I have known a mine in Colorado to produce $10,000 a day for every working-day for ten days. I know a mine in the State of Colorado at Cripple Creek—and it can be proved by the records of the mine—which had produced gold in quantities, not a little, but in a large quantity, that did not cost them 5 cents an ounce, and the mint was ready to pay $20.67 an ounce for it. Those are the exceptions. Most miners never have the fortune to drop on a mine of that kind. They can not do it. But such a strike will stimulate thousands of people to work; and sometimes a man will get but little out of a mine, but it is property and he hopes some time to make it a paying mine.

I recall two men from the State of Illinois whom I happened to know who came to Colorado in 1861. They were two common laboring men. They went on the side of a mountain, and opened a vein, and they took a wheelbarrow and wheeled the ore down to the stream and washed it; and when they went home they had made, from their summer's work, enough to buy each of them 160 acres of good Illinois land. That mine has practically paid no money since.

I am afraid that much I have said will fall on deaf ears and will be received with a good deal of question, but I speak from actual knowledge about these affairs, as did the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] when he addressed us on this subject. We have been residents of this Western mining country for a long time. We have both been in the same business—practicing law, and I have mined more or less.

There are a few other things I wish to say before I sit down, in the interest, as I think, of our Western people. Sometimes I hear people say "the Government has been very liberal with you folks;" and you might think so if you knew some of the cases. A man came into my office one day last summer and said, "Senator, I have sold my farm." He was an old man. "I took it up as a timber claim. I have sold it." I said, "What did you get for it?" He said, "$150 an acre, and got the cash." That was a great gift to him, but he had complied with all the requirements of the law, and then he got his claim. There are thousands of men who were not able to do that, and there are thousands of men with claims who make a bare living. The man I refer to happened to locate near a town, and he sold his property at a great price.

The common farmer in our country at the present time is making money if he is in the vicinity of the cities, on farms where they raise beets. But there are thousands of men on these outside farms who are living, if not in poverty, at least not luxuriously. I think myself the time has come when we ought to be somewhat interested in seeing that the common man, the laboring man, the man who lives by his toil, shall have an opportunity, and so I object, and I object as strongly as I can, to these provisions.

I object because I feel the injustice of them. When there is a piece of land upon which a man can go and make a home, I think every interest in this nation demands that he shall be allowed to make that home. We are filling up our cities with a population that ought to be on the farms, and we are withholding from the people the opportunity to go on farms. I need not say how much better it would be to have settlements than to have forests.

There are in the history of the world many instances where the common people have occupied the land in great numbers, and they made a living, and in all history it is the common people who furnish the wealth; it is the common people who, when the Government is in distress, furnish the soldiers; it is the common people who hold up the banner of every country in the world; and it always has been so. It is not the rich men. It is the poor.

When Rome had her citizens on farms, averaging only 12 acres, that was the day of Rome's greatest glory. And when these farms had been aggregated in great estates and the farmer had become a tenant and a serf, then Rome lost the vigor and the influence that it had before, and the Romans would not fight for a government that did not protect them. Some writer has said, and said it truthfully, too, and it ought to be impressed upon every government in the world: "Patriotism only arises from protection. If you do not protect the people, you will have no patriotism." You may talk about love of the flag. No man loves a flag unless it stands for everything that is good to him. It must stand not for power, but for benefit to him.

Mr. President, we are a great nation. We are the greatest nation in the world, it is said. We have been for many years in that category. We are now probably richer in wealth and poorer in men than ever before in the history of this country. I do not mean by that that our men are less honest or less good or less faithful to the country, but we have filled up the country with people who are foreign to our Government, foreign to our principles, and foreign to our flag. We have not always treated the common man as we ought to have done.

It is true we have opened up great areas of country by the citizens. I have before me a statement from the Land Office showing that under the homestead act alone, passed in 1862, 904,674 patents have been issued. In the last eleven years 100,000,000 acres were taken under that act. There are millions and millions of acres yet that ought to be taken under that act. There are a million entries now that have not been patented, not of mineral land, but of agricultural land. There are 1,073,837 patents yet withheld.

Yesterday or the day before a Senator from one of the Western States said to me, "I have a friend who has taken a piece of coal land in Colorado. He paid $20 an acre for it, and he paid for it three years ago. He has not yet got the patent." There are many people in the United States who have paid for coal land in Colorado and who have not got a patent, although years have passed since they paid for it, and they are not men who would be indicted in any court for stealing coal lands or anything else.

I measure my words when I say that for the last five years there has been no encouragement by Government officials to any man to make a home on the public land. There have been obstructions, hindrances, and annoyances thrown in their way, and while last year there were 13,900,000 acres of homesteads entered, it was because of the inordinate anxiety on the part of our people to make homes.

I said the other day, and I repeat it now, that more than 100,000 men from Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin alone have gone into British Columbia within the last three or four years. They ought to have been kept here and would have been kept here if we had been as liberal with them as the Canadian Government is with the people who go there.

Mr. President, we gave to the railroads 300,000,000 acres of land. There has been great complaint about it. The Government of the United States never lost a dollar by that. You put that charge upon the settlers of the great West. When you did that you raised the price of the land from $1.25 to $2.50, and they are the people who built these railroads, not the United States or the capitalists of the East. They are the people who built the great West.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. TELLER. I will listen to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been attracted, I think for a second time, by what the Senator from Colorado says about the people who have left the agricultural States of the West and gone over into British Columbia. I am somewhat familiar with that exodus. I have seen some of those people. My information is that most of them are men who took up land at $1.25 an acre, and perhaps some of them at a higher price, in those agricultural States, which has become worth $50 or $75 or $100 an acre, and they have sold that land and gone into British Columbia, where they can get virgin land at $8 or $10 an acre, and that it is simply a good business proposition on their part. They have made their fortune practically in the advance in the price of their lands in Iowa and Minnesota and have now gone into a magnificent agricultural region in British Columbia, where they can buy land for a very small proportion of what they sold their farms for. I think a great many of them are of that class.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know much about them personally. I do not think any considerable number have gone from my State, because the opportunities, not to get land, but to better their condition, are perhaps as good in Colorado as elsewhere. But it certainly would have been better to have kept those people at home.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no question about that.

Mr. TELLER. And we could have kept them at home if we had reserved this land for them instead of giving it to the railroad companies. It is too late to complain, I know.

But when people talk about the great aggregation of land in individual hands you can trace it to those grants. There are men in the West who own 100,000 acres, every acre bought of a railroad company, not an acre from the Government, not an acre from individuals.

Every little while somebody says all the lands are being absorbed by the great capitalists. I have taken occasion to inquire into that by looking at the statistics of the Government. In 1850 there were about 55 acres more land in every farm than there are to-day. In most of the States there has been a reduction in the size of farms since 1850, and the aggregate now is 147 against 202 in 1850. But for the fact that we have allowed the railroad companies to take the lands and sell them out in great quantities there would have been a still greater difference. Take the State of Wyoming. It has more acres in its farms than any other State in the Union. It has an average of about 1,000 acres to a farm, and many of the farms in the older-settled country are less than 100 acres. I am sure no great harm will come to the country because the farms in Wyoming have 1,000 acres. When a neighbor comes from the East and wants to buy, they will sell him half of the land.

The coal lands have passed, it is said, into the hands of large interests. In thirty-three years the Government has sold 406,000 acres of coal lands at from $10 to $20 an acre. It is said that large amounts of land were acquired that had coal in it. If the State of Colorado I can show you lands the surface of which is worth $150 an acre for agricultural purposes, and underneath is coal which makes it worth more than twice as much as the surface value. They were all entered as agricultural lands when there was not a law in the United States that recognized the difference between agricultural lands and coal lands.

There are thousands of acres of land in the State of Illinois—just as good on the surface as any other land in the State—that have value underneath in coal greatly exceeding the surface value, all taken as agricultural lands, and all taken under the law when they could not take land in any other way.

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate long enough. I have not said a great many things which I ought to have said, and I am afraid I may have said some things which I might have left unsaid. But I have said them from a sense of duty. I have not desired to attack anybody. I have not desired to unreasonably complain. I have restrained my feeling on many questions because of the place where I stand. I should like to have said and would have said in some arenas what I have not said here.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I notice on page 291 of this statement of expenditures of the Agricultural Department that there was paid to the State of California $8,183.61, to the State of Colorado $12,526.45, to the State of Idaho $6,520.57, Montana $5,767.90, Nebraska $790.37, Nevada $24, South Dakota $3,595.36, Utah, $9,003.50, Washington $1,922.23, and the State of Wyoming $6,777.95. It makes in all some forty thousand dollars out of this lump sum which has been paid to those States. I should like to have the Senator explain to me why they paid those sums to these States out of this fund, derived from the sale of timber.

Mr. TELLER. I think I can tell the Senator. If I am wrong, some special friend of the Department can correct me.

Two years ago, I think, we passed a bill here by which we provided that 10 per cent of all the proceeds from the sale of timber and the granting of grazing privileges should be turned over to the States.

Mr. OVERMAN. What States?

Mr. TELLER. The States where the timber was produced or the grazing took place.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why are those particular States entitled to this fund? It all belongs to the Government of the United States. Why should it not go into the Treasury as a part of the general fund?

Mr. TELLER. I did not originate that bill and I did not vote for it. Somebody can tell why, I suppose. I do not pretend to know; and, not being overfriendly toward the administration of this Service, I will not undertake to say.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. The payments to the State, to which the Senator from North Carolina refers, are made upon a very logical basis, and I think the payments allowed are inadequate. It must be borne in mind that in the State of Idaho a considerable percentage of the surface of the entire State is embraced within forest reservations. I do not recall the exact percentage; but probably one-fifth of the State in which I live is embraced within the areas of these forest reserves. The States are unable to collect any taxes within this area, permanently withdrawn from settlement and sale. But at the same time the State is burdened with the expense of maintaining the public roads, of executing the criminal laws, and all that appertains to a police jurisdiction over that region.

Mr. WARREN. Especially the schools.

Mr. CARTER. Of course there are schools within the area, established by the few citizens abiding there. Suddenly the property surrounding is withdrawn from settlement and sale and permanently dedicated to forest-reserve purposes. In connection with the forest-reserve purposes is the sale from time to time of timber matured. Instead of leaving the entire burden of police regulation over that area upon the State without any compensating benefit, Congress thought proper to authorize and direct that a certain percentage of the receipts from the sales of timber and other things should be paid over to the States in order to compensate them for the expense incident and unavoidably incident to the administration of the local law.

Mr. OVERMAN. What expense has the State in policing the forest reserves? I see from this statement that the General Government spends a good deal of money in policing and taking care of the reserves and in executing the criminal laws of the country in this particular territory. What expenditures are made by the States in the protection of these forests?

Mr. CARTER. The forest-reserve agent only executes the law of Congress by protecting the timber from devastation, either by individuals or by the elements, by fire. Where, however, a homicide is committed in the remotest part of one of these forest reserves, the county in which the reserve is located must pay the police officers to make arrests, must stand the burden of the expense incident to impaneling a jury, and the trial of the case just as though the forest reserve did not exist.

The jurisdiction of the United States over the forest reserve does not at all conflict with the local police jurisdiction, nor does the Federal Government assume to bear the burden of sustaining the public schools or the public roads extending through the forest reserves, except to the extent that the forest-reserve people build roads and maintain them for their own use or convenience.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator also add that had this land not been reserved for forestry purposes it would have been open to sale, and that 5 per cent of the receipts of the sales would have gone to the States?

Mr. CARTER. Not only the proceeds from the sale of the land, but from the sale of timber as well would go to the State under existing law. I think, upon mature reflection, the Senator from North Carolina will perceive the entire justice of this. My contention is——

Mr. OVERMAN. I inquired only for information, I will say to the Senator. I saw these items here and I could not understand why receipts from the sale of timber should be paid to any particular State.

Mr. CARTER. For the purpose I have indicated such payments are made, and I reassert that I believe the payments allowed to the States are not adequate to compensate for the expense of executing the local laws.

Mr. WARREN. They are not. The amount ought to be double.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator had concluded.

I only wish to say in this connection that a couple of years ago members from the Pacific coast States asked that it be increased to 25 per cent, and it should have been increased to 25 per cent, because that amount will not compensate the State for what they lose in taxes by having these vast areas withdrawn from settlement, and consequently withdrawn from the possibility of entering into private ownership and thereby contributing to the building up and development of the industries of the State and to paying revenue toward meeting the charges of the State government.

Mr. OVERMAN. How does the State lose any taxes? The land is not open to settlement.

Mr. FULTON. It is withdrawing the territory which properly should go in and become a part of the revenue of the State, and become a part of the property of the State.

Mr. OVERMAN. In other words, the State would have received some revenue if somebody had settled on it?

Mr. FULTON. How does the Senator say that nobody would settle on it?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not say that and I would not say it. I say it is only anticipating that somebody will settle on it and thus revenue will be produced to the State.

Mr. FULTON. I imagine when the first settlers went to North Carolina and South Carolina they rather supposed there would be other people there and that a community would grow up and develop into a State, and that the property would be enhanced by reason of the opportunity which would be given to individuals to enter the public land. Does the Senator not know that when the pioneers went out to Oregon and to Washington they expected that the public land there would be open to settlement and that other people would come and help pay the cost of building up their school systems and all the institutions that go to make a great Commonwealth? Does not the Senator know that that can not be brought about to the fullest extent unless the populations are there to enter and homestead the land and to have homes built?

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree to all that; but the State has not actually lost anything by reason of the land being put into a forest reserve, because it derives no revenue from this territory, as it might have done if there was a settlement there.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator thinks there is nothing in that, of course there is no use for argument.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Senator how he arrives at the proportion of 10 per cent?

Mr. FULTON. I am trespassing on the time of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TELLER. I will yield for a very brief period.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I can add something to the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon as well as that of the Senator from North Carolina.

In Idaho just after or about the time of our admission we entered upon the construction of a north and south road throughout the State. That was before we had certain railroads that have been built since. We expended two or three hundred thousand dollars in building those roads, and under an act of the legislature we issued bonds to raise the money to pay for it. We have paid those bonds. We built those roads at a cost, I think, of about $230,000.

The Forest Service has sequestered those roads. They have taken possession of the greater portion of them and included them within the forest reserves and they are no longer open to travel except under the rather embarrassing rules of the Forest Service. Now, I think it would take some time for the State to be remunerated for that loss alone.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from Idaho is somewhat surprising and somewhat terrorizing. What right has the Government of the United States to take possession of a road in the State of Idaho, no matter by whom it was built? It has no right to build a road there unless it wants gratuitously to turn it over to Idaho. Idaho, under the police powers of the State, has the absolute control of its roads. McLean said, away back years ago, that the right of a State to build roads over the national lands could not be controverted. It never had been, he said, and had always been exercised. McCrary, who for many years was a Member of the House and afterwards circuit judge in the eighth circuit, made the same statement in a case which I have already cited to the Senate. He said a State has a right to build its roads if it wanted, and could condemn its roads. The State of Illinois asserted that right, the State of Indiana asserted it, and Iowa asserted it. Every State in the Union having public lands asserted it. The right belongs to the State to build roads. The United States can not take possession legally of a road, nor can it build one unless the State agrees that it may do so.

Mr. President, I say that is an astonishing statement, and it is a terrorizing statement, Mr. President, when you think that the Government of the United States invades a State and determines where its road shall be and who shall travel on it. It is an assumption of sovereignty that the United States can not maintain. I can find a hundred cases in the courts of the United States against that assumption on the part of the Government. It is not on the part of the Government that the assumption is made. It is made by the irresponsible employees of the Forest Service.

Mr. President, the State of Idaho ought to drive them out of that road and take possession of it; and the time will come when the question must be settled between the States and the Government, whether we are without right and these employees in the Forest Service are so omnipotent as the Senator the other day showed they claimed to be in Idaho. They have never made any such assertion in Colorado. They did assert in one of the counties that when the road built by the county touched the forest reserve, upon which there was not any more timber than there is upon any vacant lot in this city, they must give a bond that they would not disturb the forest reserve.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not like to interrupt the Senator from Colorado, except where I feel that it would help to carry out his idea.

Mr. TELLER. Go on.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not only did they take possession of those roads, but, more startling still, they took more than thirty schoolhouses and included them within the forest reserves, representing more than thirty school communities. They included them within the forest reserves, and they have surrounded them, in many instances, with a solid line of forest reserves.

Mr. WARREN. What have they done with the schoolhouses? What use did they put them to?

Mr. HEYBURN. Those little stranded communities that hoped to be the nucleus of a growing, prosperous, community are staying there and praying that the Government may become rational once again.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TELLER. I think I will conclude. The Senator can take the floor in his own right after I get through.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not want to interfere with the Senator from Colorado. I merely wanted to ask a question of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator from Colorado resumes his seat, as he is speaking about arbitrary measures, I wish to ask him to let me read something. It was alluded to yesterday in his speech. A good deal has been said here about arbitrary power and the irresponsible exercise of power. The Senator quoted from the constitution of Massachusetts, which was apt and appropriate, and I took the liberty at the time of calling his attention to another clause in the constitution of Massachusetts which I endeavored to quote from memory. Since then, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has handed me a copy of the constitution of Massachusetts, and in order that the provision may be correctly quoted, I ask leave now, before the Senator closes his remarks, that I may read it. It is the thirtieth article of the constitution of Massachusetts. The language of it is this:

> In the government of this Commonwealth the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them; the executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers, or either of them; the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them; to the end it may be a government of laws and not of men.

That is a principle, Mr. President, which I think is equally as important in the Federal Government as it is in the State government of Massachusetts, and I think there are some officers of the Federal Government who would do well to regard the injunction and obey the injunction which is contained in that article of the constitution of Massachusetts.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I was about stating what interference had been made on State rights. The county of Mesa, in the State of Colorado, undertook to build a road. It went across one corner of a reservation upon which there was absolutely no timber or never had been any. It was incorporated into the reserve, I suppose, for the purpose of raising timber on it some time, but they have not yet commenced raising timber. The ranger notified the county officers that they must give bond that their roads should not interfere with the reserve, and thereupon the county executed its bond and signed it and sent it to Washington. Then they came back with a statement that they could not accept it without two individual signers.

The county did not feel very much like going out and asking some citizen to sign its bond that they would not interfere with the reservation; and as the road did not interfere with it except to allow people to pass over it, and it was not fenced, the district attorney of the county sent it to me. I wrote him what I have been familiar with, because I lived in Illinois in an early day and knew something about what had been the custom there about roads; that the State had the right to pass over roads in public lands, and that the reservation of forests did not come within that constitutional provision where we were expected to refrain from exercising any power by ceding to the Government the sovereignty over it.

I said in my judgment the thing for the county to do is to proceed and build the road and pay no attention to this man. If the Government thinks it is worth while to bring a suit, then you will try the question whether you are entitled to do it or not. The result was that the county went on and built the road. The Government did not bring a suit, as I knew it would not, because I knew whenever they submitted it to the Attorney-General here he would have sense enough to know they could not maintain it.

That brings me to say we have been for four or five years trying to get the Government of the United States to bring a suit against some of our citizens to test some of these questions, and we have, I believe, got an agreed case that is probably going to get to the Supreme Court in the next three or four years, when these questions will be settled. It will probably take that time to get it through.

There can not be any question about these things. They have been settled again and again by the Supreme Court of the United States. The Supreme Court is not going to change its ruling of forty and fifty years and in forty and fifty cases, not even at the suggestion of the Executive that the time has come when you must give to the executive department more power.

Mr. President, if the executive department need more power, which I do not think they do, there is only one way to get it, and that is by an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I simply wish to make a suggestion in connection with what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has said in regard to the administration of the forest reserves, the taking possession of highways that have been laid out by the counties, of schoolhouses that have been constructed by school districts, and so forth.

I think it is perhaps not sufficiently clearly understood that the objection of the people of the West to the forest reserves, speaking broadly, is not to the maintenance of reserves proper, but to the manner of the administration, more particularly, of those reserves and to the inclusion within them of lands that are valuable for agricultural purposes and for home building.

We recognize and appreciate the fact that it is important that the timber resources of the country should be conserved, and, indeed, that the water power and the water supply of the country should be conserved; but those who are charged with the administration of these reserves seem to have imbibed the idea and to be moving under the conviction that they are absolute law unto themselves, and that the people of the communities in the region of the reserves have no rights that they are bound to respect.

For instance, I spoke yesterday of a practice they have of impounding cattle from the ranches and the small farms lying in the vicinity of the reserve. Those people have feed enough for their stock during the severe winter months when they are required to feed, but it is important to them to be permitted to turn out their stock as early in the spring as possible. To compel them to keep their stock up beyond the usual feeding time is imposing upon them a very great hardship. Yet if they turn their stock at large, as they are permitted to do under the laws of the State, and the stock wander on the reserves and pasture there, these rangers assume the authority, without a single letter of law to support it, to arrest the stock, impound them, and impose fines and penalties on the owners.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I am not familiar with the public-land laws, there not being any public land in my State and none having ever been there, I have never investigated these questions. I want to ask the Senator, as a lawyer and as one living in a State where there is a large amount of public lands, whether, outside of the mere matter of exemption from taxation, when the Government owns land in a State, it has any other relation to that land than any other owner of land has in the State?

Mr. FULTON. None whatever. It is just that proposition I wish to present, because it does seem to me that we ought by legislation to impress that fact on the minds of the people who are charged with the administration of these reserves. The Supreme Court of the United States has held over and over again exactly the proposition which the Senator from Georgia announced, namely, that the only interest, the only title, the only right, the Government had in and over those lands is that of a proprietor. It has been announced in many cases, but I happen to have here the case of Fort Leavenworth Railroad v. Lowe (114 U. S.), where Justice Field announced the decision. The question there was concerning one tract of land that had been reserved for a military station, and the court, in discussing that question, said:

> The land constituting the reservation was part of the territory acquired in 1803 by cession from France, and, until the formation of the State of Kansas, and her admission into the Union, the United States possessed the rights of a proprietor, and had political dominion and sovereignty over it. For many years before that admission it had been reserved from sale by the proper authorities of the United States for military purposes, and occupied by them as a military post. The jurisdiction of the United States over it during this time was necessarily paramount. But in 1861 Kansas was admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States; that is, with the same rights of political dominion and sovereignty, subject, like them, only to the Constitution of the United States. Congress might undoubtedly, upon such admission, have stipulated for retention of the political authority, dominion, and legislative power of the United States over the reservation, so long as it should be used for military purposes by the Government; that is, it could have excepted the place from the jurisdiction of Kansas, as one needed for the uses of the General Government. But from some cause, inadvertence, perhaps, or overconfidence that a recession of such jurisdiction could be had whenever desired, no such stipulation or exception was made. The United States therefore retained, after the admission of the State, only the rights of an ordinary proprietor; except as an instrument for the execution of the powers of the General Government, that part of the tract which was actually used for a fort or military post was beyond such control of the State, by taxation or otherwise, as would defeat its use for those purposes. So far as the land constituting the reservation was not used for military purposes, the possession of the United States was only that of an individual proprietor. The State could have exercised with reference to it the same authority and jurisdiction which she could have exercised over similar property held by private parties. (114 U. S., pp. 526–7. Fort Leavenworth R. R. Co. v. Lowe.)

Mr. BACON. I understand, though that decision relates only to Kansas, it applies in its principle to all States having public lands.

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. There are twenty-five or thirty cases of the same kind.

Mr. FULTON. There are many of them. I could get at least a dozen cases.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to inquire of the Senator upon what theory, then, the public lands belonging to the United States are exempt from taxation by the States? Is that expressly stipulated?

Mr. FULTON. The State always stipulates that. The States stipulate, when they are admitted, to except public lands and public property from taxation.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Has that always been done?

Mr. FULTON. I think it has always been done.

Mr. TELLER. That has been done in the admission of every State in which the Government had public lands. Both Judge Sawyer and Judge Field, in the California reports, declared that but for that stipulation the States might have taxed the lands. In the Alabama case the court, speaking on it, said it was a contract only not to tax; that that was all there was of it, and any greater stipulation on the part of the State could not have been of any value to the Government, because the United States had not the authority to exercise any municipal power.

Mr. FULTON. The United States Supreme Court has held time and again that the property which is held by the Federal Government is subject to the right of eminent domain, the same as the property of a private individual is subject to the right of eminent domain, to lay it out into roads or to devote it to any public purpose. And yet, notwithstanding this fact, these people presume to ignore the laws of the State in which the reserves are located and to annul them by arresting the stock of the residents there running at large in obedience to the laws of the State.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. In this connection I called the Senator's attention yesterday to the decision of the Federal court in Montana, in which they held that stock running on a forest reserve was subject to be put off for trespassing, notwithstanding the State law against fencing. I have made some inquiry since that time, and I find that case was appealed to the circuit court, sitting at San Francisco, and that the contention of the forest reserve official was sustained in a decision of the circuit court some time last February, holding that they did have the right.

Mr. FULTON. I have been unable, I will state——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. FULTON. Just one second, if the Senator will allow me. I will state to the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] that I have looked very carefully for that decision, and I have been unable to find it. I should be very glad if the Senator will find it for me. Of course I would not pretend to say that the Senator is incorrect in his statement, but I think it is possible he is mistaken.

Mr. DIXON. No.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will get the report, I shall be glad to see it, so as to ascertain on what proposition it went off.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has the decision on his desk. It has not yet been printed in the court reports; but the Senator from Utah, I think, has the decision on his desk.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will wait until I complete the statement I was about to make, I will then yield. I do know it has been held by at least two district judges that there is no authority of law for such a holding as the Senator from Montana says was made in the circuit court of appeals, and in the nature of things any such decision must be in violation of the rule announced by the Supreme Court quite recently, which was really only a reiteration of what it has announced time and again, namely, that no Department can by a rule which it makes fix a penalty; and there certainly is no law enacted by Congress making it an offense for cattle to be found at large on a reservation. I will defy any man to point out an act of Congress that makes that an offense.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. FULTON. I promised to yield to the Senator from Colorado, but, with his consent, I will yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. TELLER. Very well.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] whether the decision to which he refers was based upon an assumption that the United States, by reason of its sovereignty, was exempt from the control of a State law of Montana, or whether it was based upon the proposition that the law of Montana was violative of all rights of property, in that it permitted trespass upon private property generally; for, as I understand, the law of that State permitted cattle owned by parties to run at large.

Mr. FULTON. In the State of Montana?

Mr. NEWLANDS. In the State of Montana.

Mr. FULTON. I do not know what the State law is.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I could well understand how the decision might have been based upon the latter proposition—that is, the taking of private property for public use without compensation—it being practically a confiscation of private property to provide by law that the owner of cattle may run his cattle upon the land of another, whether that land belonged to the United States or to some private proprietor.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will excuse me, I promised to yield to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. CARTER. Very well.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] that I have made an examination, and, so far as I have been able to go—I have not seen, of course, the statutes of all the States—I find that in Massachusetts, in Connecticut, in New Hampshire, and other New England States; in Illinois, in Indiana, and in New York, they all have laws of that kind; that in order to charge a man with trespass of his cattle, the party bringing the suit must have a field inclosed with a fence of a certain kind and character, and the Supreme Court has sustained that as good law.

Mr. President, as to eminent domain, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the case of the Union Pacific Railway Company v. The Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company in Nebraska, in 3 Federal Reporter, 106. I do not know whether that case ever went up or not. Judge McCrary, of the circuit court, in that case said:

> It is now well settled that the right of eminent domain is a right inherent in every government, and that it belongs alike to the States and to the United States. Each within its own sphere of governmental action may exercise it. (The United States v. Chicago, 7 How., 185; Kohl v. The United States, 91 U. S., 367.)

Again, he says:

> Land owned by the United States, as a mere proprietor, and not used for any of the purposes of the National Government, may be taken by the State for public use. (United States v. Railroad Bridge Company, 6 McLean, 517.)

Again, on page 111, he says:

> That the condemnation of a right of way in the exercise of the power of eminent domain is a public matter, within the rule, is not only clear, under the authorities, but also upon principle, since the proceedings can be justified only upon the ground that the land should be taken for public use and for the public interest. (In the case of The United States v. Chicago, 7 Howard, 194–5.)

The court said:

> It is not questioned that land within a State purchased by the United States as a mere proprietor, and not reserved or appropriated to any special purpose, may be liable to condemnation for streets or highways, like the land of other proprietors, under the rights of eminent domain.
> But that was not the condition of this quarter section, being a part of the land originally ceded to the United States as the Northwest Territory, and afterwards specially set apart for their use for military purposes. Here the opening of these streets would also injure, if not destroy, the great objects of the reservation. Nor was any compensation proposed or made, as in other cases, for condemning this land and damaging the building thereon. It seems, too, that, though land purchased within a State for ordinary purposes by the General Government must yield to the local public demands, yet land, when held like this, at first by an original cession to that Government and afterwards appropriated for a specific public object, can not easily be shown liable to be taken away for an ordinary local object, though public, and especially one under another government and by mere implication. (United States v. Ames, 1 Woodb. & Min., 88.)

In that instance the law did not apply to that case, because that had been specifically set apart for a governmental purpose, for a court, or something of that kind, I have forgotten what.

In the case of Illinois Central Railroad v. Illinois (146 U. S., p. 434) the court said:

> The State of Illinois was admitted into the Union in 1818 on an equal footing with the original States in all respects. Such was one of the conditions of the cession from Virginia of the territory northwest of the Ohio River, out of which the State was formed. But the equality prescribed would have existed if it had not been stipulated. There can be no distinction between the several States of the Union in the character of the jurisdiction, sovereignty, and dominion which they may exercise over persons and subjects within their respective limits. (Art. IV and sec. 3 of the United States Constitution.)

On page 435, in the same case, the court said:

> It is the settled law of this country that the ownership of and dominion and sovereignty over lands covered by tide waters within the limits of the several States belongs to the respective States, within which they are found, with the consequent right to use or dispose of any portion thereof, when that can be done without substantial impairment of the interest of the public in the water, subject always to the paramount right of Congress to control the navigation, so far as may be necessary, for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the States.

The court adds:

This doctrine is applicable to the lands covered by the Great Lakes.

In the same case above cited the court declares that:

The States hold the title to such lands and the water over them in trust for the people, and can not dispose of the same except in the proper discharge of such trust. (See p. 453.)

And that property so held by the State—can not be placed entirely beyond the direction and control of the State (p. 454).

Again:

Such property is held by the State, by virtue of its sovereignty, in trust for the public.

In this case the court quotes from Martin v. Waddell (16 Peters) and cites the case in support of its opinion. (See pp. 456–457.)

See Weber v. Harbor Commissioners (18 Wall., p. 57 et seq). Also Hoboken v. Pennsylvania Railroad (124 U. S., pp. 656–657).

Mr. President, I have here—and I think I can put my hand on it—the opinion of Chief Justice McLean. It will be found in 6 McLean. It must have been forty-five or fifty years ago when that case was decided—I do not remember exactly—where this question of the right of a State to put a road across Government national land, land belonging to the Government, was fully held to belong to the State, and the judge said that always from the time the Government was organized it had been, without any special law, exercised by the States and conceded to them by the General Government.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator from Montana——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FULTON. Just for a question.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to the fact that the case cited by the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] is not the only case in which that question has been decided. I see that there are five or six other cases that have been decided by the circuit court of appeals in this country touching that very subject.

Mr. FULTON. Has the Senator from Utah the cases there?

Mr. SMOOT. I have the cases here.

Mr. FULTON. I should be glad to see them.

Mr. SMOOT. In due time I shall furnish them.

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator only rose to tell me that there are such cases without producing them, of course that is his privilege.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. FULTON. I do.

Mr. DIXON. I have here the original opinion of the district Federal judge in the Montana case—the United States v. Shannon—where he sustains an injunction forbidding Shannon to trespass; and also the opinion of the circuit court of appeals at San Francisco sustaining the decision of the district court of Montana upon this very point.

Mr. FULTON. Yes; but we were discussing criminal prosecutions. The Senator comes forward with a civil suit, a decree in a civil suit granting an injunction, which, I submit to the Senator, only sustains my contention that the right of the Government is that of a proprietor. It may maintain, of course, a civil suit to protect its right of property; but that is a vastly different proposition from assuming to make a penalty and to enforce the penalty for trespass upon property. It has the same rights, it can exercise the same powers that an individual can exercise concerning the property he owns; but has the Senator ever heard that the individual had a right to prescribe a penalty and to enforce it?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly; if the Senator has the decisions he referred to.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the act of Congress of June 4, 1897, authorized the Secretary of the Interior to make rules and regulations governing the occupancy and use of the national forests——

Mr. FULTON. Exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. Wait a moment—and to preserve the forests from destruction. The same act of Congress expressly made the violation of such rules and regulations a crime and prescribed the punishment.

Mr. FULTON. Where is the act of Congress that does that?

Mr. SMOOT. The act of June 4, 1897.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator show me where the act of June 4, 1897, made it a crime to trespass upon these lands?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will read the act he will find out where that is.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator is citing the act. I say there is no such provision in the act.

Mr. SMOOT. All I can say is that I shall be glad to have the Senator read the act.

Mr. BACON. The Senator might very safely say that if there is any such provision in the act it is absolutely void.

Mr. FULTON. And I should supplement it by the statement of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. But, Mr. President, there is a wider question and a greater one than that. Suppose it has been held by some of these inferior courts that the regulations of the Secretary or of a Department officer may have the validity and dignity of law. I would not believe that to be the law until the Supreme Court of the United States had said so, because it is so utterly at war with my convictions as to what the constitutional rights of the States and of the individual are.

But, as I was saying, above all that do we want it to be the law? Do we want the acts of Congress to invade the States and to invalidate the laws and regulations of the States in their domestic affairs? If there is one thing more than another, I take it, which the States ought to be allowed to regulate it is the question of whether or not its farms should be fenced and stock should be allowed to range free on the common lands unless the lands should be fenced. That is a most ordinary and simple matter, usually and customarily left to the State. If we have the power, do we want to exercise it? Was it ever the intention of Congress to exercise such a power? I do not believe there can be found a statute that would indicate that it was the purpose of Congress at any time to exercise such a power.

Mr. TELLER. Congress can not do it under the Constitution.

Mr. FULTON. That is my contention, and it is my firm conviction that we can not do it; but I say, if we could do it, do we want to do it? Has Congress ever indicated a purpose to do such a thing? If the General Government does not want stock that is running at large in a State pursuant to the laws and the policy of the State to go upon its domain, why should it not do as every other proprietor of land in that State is compelled to do—fence its land, or station guards there who would protect the land against trespass?

So I again say, Mr. President—I had not intended to take up time to discuss this question—that it is not that we object to the forest reserves, but it is that we object to the arbitrary and oppressive rules and regulations adopted and enforced in the administration of the reserves. I think the committee charged with providing for these reserves and their administration should bring in a bill that will restrict the officials in the administration of these arbitrary rules.

I do not think that a poor farmer who has gone upon a piece of land within half a mile of a reserve should be subjected to the hardship and the expense of putting a herder in charge of his cattle or his sheep to keep them off the lands of the United States, when he does not have to do it to keep them off the lands of any other proprietor within the State.

If this were really doing an injury to the public lands, there would be an equity in the proposition that would perhaps militate against the propositions that I advance; but it is not doing an injury; it is simply that the Government wants to farm its lands out for so much per acre to the stockmen, and if stock are allowed to range on the land without paying for it, it interferes with the business of leasing the range. I have never had much sympathy with the proposition that the Government of the United States should go into the farming business or the stock business or the leasing business. It has always seemed to me that that is a business that were far better left to the individual; and whatever charge is made for stock going upon the range under the regulation of the Department should only be such charge as is necessary to meet the additional expense by reason of the stock being there, and no more. The Government ought not to seek to profit by it. Such has always been my contention.

Mr. President, I apologize for taking up so much time as I have. I had not intended to discuss this matter at all.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I intend to submit a few remarks in reference to this subject-matter, but they will be of a general character. There is no one whom I desire to attack, and no one whom I care especially to defend, unless it is the Federal Government of the United States. I have no grievance in this matter to vent here before the Senate.

In the first place, is there any justification or necessity for embarking upon this forest policy? I ask Senators to look at the map of the United States hanging on the wall there. The dark-brown and light-brown parts of that map on the Eastern side of the country represent what was the timber country, much of it what we call "hard-wood timber," and the remainder of it along the ranges of the Alleghenies down through the Southern States represents the pine belt. On the Pacific coast there is, as the map shows, a little more of that brown area near the coast; but all that white expanse of land that you see there between the colored portions of the map is a vast prairie or a vast treeless plain.

The Eastern timber country was settled up many years ago. When the settlers came in there they had to cut down the timber. That was the only way they could open farms and get their meadows. They have been carrying on that work ever since that country was first settled up. Then the vast regions of the Mississippi Valley, the great States on both sides of the Mississippi River, were settled, and then west of that comes an immense arid belt, sparsely settled and with no trees of consequence, except in what you might call the trough of the Rocky Mountain range. The streak of green fragments that you see on the map represents the forest reserves. They are in the trough of what we may call the main range of the Rocky Mountains. You see another strip of green fragments representing forest reserves. They are in the Coast Range. Outside of that all that great white space there [indicating] is a treeless country.

We have settled up the land immediately adjoining the Mississippi River on both sides, and as we move westward we come to an arid and semiarid belt. In this belt it was attempted years ago, under a Federal law, to embark in the raising of trees—"timber culture," it was called. We passed a law, commonly known as the "timber-culture law," that was in force for a number of years. Under that law most of those who sought to profit by its provisions had the same experience and came to the same conclusion as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] did in respect to his timber claim. The law, as a rule, proved almost an absolute failure. There were comparatively few timber claims, proved up by pretty doubtful evidence, and finally, to save some of them who were unable to comply with the law, they were afterwards allowed to purchase the land, and then subsequently we totally repealed the law. It is exceedingly difficult, as the Senator from Colorado described it, in that arid belt to raise trees. The soil may be all right, but the water is lacking. Without irrigation you can not raise any trees in that country.

In those troughs in the Rocky Mountains we have a region where timber grows in its natural state. It is at a high altitude. That country has considerable moisture, snow in the winter and rain in the summer; and hence there is a supply of timber there.

The Government of the United States, seeing that the supply of timber in the country was gradually diminishing, embarked upon this policy in order to promote the settlement and build up all that semiarid region, which constitutes to-day over a quarter of the total area of the United States within its continental boundaries.

What is the necessity for it? I can remember when I was a boy, in 1849, when the harbor of Chicago was full of vessels loaded with pine lumber from the State of Michigan. You do not find there to-day a single schooner with pine lumber from the State of Michigan, nor have you for the last ten or fifteen years.

Then the next body of pine timber was in Wisconsin; and that, my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], whom I do not see in the Chamber at this moment, knows very well, is utterly gone. The pine timber that was on the Fox River, on the Menominee River, on the Wisconsin River, on the Chippewa River, on the Eau Claire River, and the Big Black River is practically gone to-day. There are just a few fragments that are used for pulp and inferior purposes, but not for real lumber.

My own State of Minnesota, next to the States of Michigan and Wisconsin, had the finest body of white pine timber in this country. In 1871, when I went to the State of Minnesota, most of our pine was a virgin forest, and it was a magnificent forest. But from that day on the lumbermen have been playing havoc with it, until within perhaps ten or a dozen years there will scarcely be any merchantable pine left in the State of Minnesota.

How has all this been brought about? These lumbermen, under our extremely loose and liberal land laws, would in times past secure this most valuable pine for a mere bagatelle. A dollar and a quarter an acre was the maximum. They oftentimes purchased large quantities of it with college and other scrip at a much less price. Years ago Congress gave to the different States an agricultural-college grant, and those States that had public lands within their borders selected the lands, and the other States sold their rights out by the wholesale. I know a number of States that sold that scrip at 40 and 50 cents an acre to lumbermen who entered this valuable pine land, which did not cost them on this scrip more than 50 or 60 cents an acre.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire, Has the Government any lands remaining in Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEYBURN. Has it occurred to the Senator that perhaps they should be replanting the timber upon the Government lands?

Mr. NELSON. I want to say for the information of the Senator from Idaho that we have a forest reserve in Minnesota and we hope to get another, and the State has a forest reserve.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will inquire if they are planting trees in them?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; they are planting trees.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I would merely make a closing suggestion. Would it not be just as well for the State of Minnesota to furnish the land upon which to grow its own timber, rather than to borrow the lands of Idaho upon which to plant a new forest?

Mr. NELSON. We are not borrowing from Idaho. We are not using the lands of the United States to raise timber on. As I said, these lumbermen got this valuable pine land for a mere bagatelle, and then, in embarking on their lumber operations, they carried them on in a most destructive manner. They did not go in, as is done where they have a proper forestry system, and take the dead and down timber and the mature timber. They established their camps and sent in their choppers and, to use an expression that the lumbermen use in that country, they "skinned" it, taking everything—big and little. The worst of it was that after they had taken every possible stick of timber off of a tract of land they would leave the tops and the limbs and everything there to rot and be subject to fires, so that the timber lands that were stripped by the lumbermen in that way were all burned over, and instead of becoming reforested with pine, as they would have been but for the fires, they have grown up in jack oak, grown up in poplar, and grown up in everything under the sun except being reforested as pine lands.

We have lost all that timber, and now our main supply of pine timber is in the Southern States and on the Pacific coast. After we had lost all that timber, it finally dawned upon our Government that we had to do something to stop the destruction of timber; that we ought to take a broad view of it and preserve our forests, not only for our own people and our own children, but for the generations to come. The preservation of this timber, out in the troughs of the Rocky Mountains, is not only good in itself; it not only keeps up the supply of lumber for a much longer period than would be possible without it, but it aids in the settlement and development of the great arid country which is contiguous to that mountain range and to that body of reserves that you see on the map.

What has the Government done? It has done what every other intelligent country on the face of the earth has done. Observing that the supply of timber was gradually diminishing, noticing that we had a great area of treeless country, arid country, that could not be settled without irrigation, the Government said by its legislation in 1891:

> We must make provision for the future; we must take some steps to reserve some of our forests for the future use of the American people.

So, in 1891, the first forest-reserve law was passed. It was amended in 1897. The first forest reserve that we had in this country, Mr. President, was established under the Administration, as I recall, of Grover Cleveland.

There is no use making an imaginary forest reservation on the map or on paper in one of the Departments. If you have a forest reservation you must take care of the forest and protect it, so that it will become of some use and value to the public.

So it came to pass that in 1899 the Government for the first time appointed at the head of the Forestry Service a Forester in the person of Mr. Pinchot. I wish to say about Mr. Pinchot that while in some respects I think he has been a little too radical, has gone a little too hastily and too far, yet I recognize the fact that in that line of work he is an expert of the very highest order, and that he is actuated by the highest and best possible sentiments—sentiments that every public man in this country could well be proud of. There never was a man who more faithfully went to work at a big task; and he himself had to blaze the way. There had been no beginning. As far as I know, there was no system of forestry in any of the older States. The Federal Government had nothing. He had no prototype, and he had to delve into the archives and study the systems of the old country. He had to establish the system for this country; and, considering the drawbacks he has had to contend with, I think, on the whole, he has done remarkably well.

I can see the nervousness of some of our friends from the West. I do not refer to Senators in this body, but I mean outside gentlemen from the West. Before the Government adopted the policy of forest reservations those men were in the habit of using the lands now embraced in forest reserves according to their sweet will.

They would go and strip off the timber. I remember some years ago riding on the cars from Helena to Butte. I think the Senator from Montana was with me. As we reached the neighborhood of Butte I could see the mountain sides stripped of timber for miles and miles and the stumps black. The stumps indicated that the timber had been chopped off, and there was nothing there but a burned-over waste. They absolutely stripped the country.

Unless the Government had intervened, all these timber reserves out there would in a few years have been entirely stripped and entirely destroyed; and so, Mr. President, to my mind, the Government has moved none too soon in this matter. If, in my own State—Minnesota—the Government had intervened thirty-five years ago and established a forest reserve of our magnificent pine lands, in what a happy condition our great State, with its more than 2,000,000 people, would have been to-day. We have now a small forest reserve in Minnesota. Four years ago I succeeded in getting an act passed through Congress giving the State 20,000 acres of land up in the northeastern corner, up in the iron country, back of Duluth, for forestry purposes; and the Government is about to establish, I think, one or two other reservations, and I wish the Government Godspeed in the matter.

We have a good deal of prairie country still in Minnesota. Most of it is settled up; but we need that timber, and all our farmers need it; and unless the Government intervenes in the matter, I am afraid our supply of timber will soon disappear.

But, Mr. President, the most surprising thing to me in this discussion is the attitude Senators have assumed toward the Federal Government in respect——

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator if he does not believe that the States in which there are these large reserves, valuable lands withdrawn from entry and private use, contributing in no way to the revenue of the State, should receive a larger proportion of the receipts than 10 per cent?

Mr. NELSON. The Senator knows I was in favor of that in committee.

Mr. FULTON. I know that.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator knows I favor that.

Mr. FULTON. I do; and the Senator will pardon me for asking the question, but in view of his high standing and influence I was anxious to have it on record.

Mr. NELSON. I should be very glad, speaking for myself only, to see the States, instead of getting 10 per cent, as they do now, for the benefit of the counties and the schools, get 25 per cent. That is not the point, Mr. President—as to how you distribute the proceeds of the pasture and the timber. The point is to preserve the timber.

But what has surprised me—and but for it I do not know that I should have said anything—is the tenor, the spirit, of this discussion, which has been to the effect that the Government in its efforts to establish these forest reserves in the manner it has been doing, has been an interloper, a trespasser, acting outside of its rights. Mr. President, those forest reserves are the public lands of the United States, the property of all the people of this country; and under the Constitution of the United States our Federal Government has control of those lands until it finally disposes of them. The Government has as much control over the timber on those lands as a private proprietor has over his land. It has complete control of it, to the same extent that any owner would have for purposes of use. The Constitution provides it. So far as I now recall, all acts admitting new States into the Union provide that the State admitted shall not interfere with the primary disposal of the soil.

The timber on those lands is part of the land in law, as every lawyer knows. If the Government has the right to sell the land, as is indisputable, manifestly it has the right to sell the timber or do anything it sees fit to do with it.

Mr. PERKINS. And the pasturage.

Mr. NELSON. And dispose of the pasturage, too. It has exactly the same right over its lands, both in respect to the grass and in respect to the timber, that any private owner has as to his lands.

Coming to the matter of pasturage, let us look at it in a fair and candid way. Everybody who has had anything to do with sheep and cattle knows that if you allow sheep and cattle in excessive numbers to range and pasture in a body of timber, they will kill it, especially sheep, and to some extent cattle.

It was out of the question for the General Government, in carrying on its Forest Reserve Service, to protect its growing timber unless it took some steps to regulate and control pasturage. On my own farm when I have had a small piece of brush land that I wanted to clear, I would fence it in by itself and turn in a lot of sheep and cattle and hogs and in a year or two every little brush or tree would be dead and gone. So with our forest reserves. If there was the unlimited right of pasturage in the forest reserves, it would prove utterly destructive to the growth of timber.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Then, I suppose, the Senator would not allow pasturage at all on the forest reserves?

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no; the Senator misunderstood me. I said that the matter of pasturage should be regulated, so that an excessive number of cattle and sheep should not be allowed to range there—a number that would prove destructive to the forests.

Mr. TELLER. The forest ranger determines that for the Department, and he generally puts in as many cattle as he can get in. It is a question of dollars and cents. It is a question of making it pay expenses.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator from Colorado will allow me, that is a question of mere detail, which I will not argue or discuss with him.

Mr. TELLER. Let me say——

Mr. NELSON. It may be as the Senator says, that sometimes they let in too many cattle. That is a matter of administration. But it does not go to the general principle of the policy that the Government is aiming to carry out.

Mr. TELLER. If the forest reserves are of so much importance and so useful, they ought not to be pastured at all. If you are going to raise——

Mr. NELSON. I have been in the Senator's State. Let me explain it to him. There are many of these troughs or basins, in what is called the "Rocky Mountain Range," where the timber—the pine, the spruce—is scattering and limited. There are trees only here and there. They are not against forests such as the pine forests of Minnesota or Michigan or Wisconsin at an early day. They are straggling, scattered trees, and in between these trees there is a lot of grass and vegetation; and a limited amount of pasturage in that kind of a forest is helpful, because it takes away the dead grass that would otherwise accumulate and might lead to destruction by fire. Cattle grazing there destroy the surplus of grass, and it is not left to be caught by fire, as it would be in many instances.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say to the Senator that there has been no complaint amongst the people of overpasturing in the country in which I live. That comes from the Department. There have been some quarrels with the sheep men and the cattlemen, and sheep have sometimes, perhaps, eaten up the pasture too close. Cattle do not, as I understand.

Mr. WARREN. Has not the complaint been that the Department has not admitted enough cattle and sheep to satisfy the people?

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator from Colorado, if he will allow me—and I do not want to cut him off in his statement—that I have myself in times past discussed the matter with Mr. Pinchot and told him that I thought that in some instances he was pasturing the land a little too freely; that if pastured less it would be better; but he explained to me the conditions, and last summer I noticed, for the first time, when I was out in the Senator's State that the conditions in the forests in that country are entirely different from those in my country. In the forests in my country there is a dense body of timber. There is no grass at all. The soil is almost bare. But you go into the straggling, scrubby forests of the mountain ranges and you will find there are big strips and bodies of land and there is no underbrush, while there is a large amount of grass, and I can readily see what advantage it is to have that kind of land pastured.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. NELSON. I really owe an apology to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. FULTON. I merely want to suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that I hope he will be more specific in naming the States concerning which he is talking when he speaks about scrubby forests. I suppose the Senator meant Minnesota, of course.

Mr. NELSON. I want the Senator to feel that I am in this mood; and he will pardon me if I illustrate it. They tell of a noted prelate in the Northwest who was a great temperance man. He preached against saloons all the time. Finally one day he wanted to raise some money for the church, and he called on one of the leading saloon keepers in town, who had an elegant saloon, with mirrors all around the interior. The reverend gentleman said "Tim, I should like to get $50 from you to-day for the church." "But, Father," said Tim, "you ought not to ask any money of me, when you are all the time running down my business." "Oh, well," said the priest, "Tim, I am not making war on such elegant places as yours. It is the low groggeries." [Laughter.]

Mr. FULTON. I will say that the explanation is quite satisfactory. [Laughter.]

Mr. NELSON. One sometimes can bring an argument home by an illustration. I now yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I am somewhat reluctant to continue this debate, but since I sat down there has been a question raised as to how the Government holds its property. I quoted one authority. I want to put in another. It is the case of the United States v. The Railroad Bridge Company, decided in 1855 by John McLean. Everyone who is familiar with court proceedings remembers John McLean, one of the great judges of the United States Supreme Court. I want to read just briefly what he said. It is a long case, and I have picked out the points most important:

Within the limits of a State, Congress can, in regard to the disposition of the public lands and their protection, make all needful rules and regulations. But beyond this it can exercise no other acts of sovereignty which it may not exercise in common over the lands of individuals. (P. 532.)

Again:

It is a fair implication, that if the State were not restrained by compact, it could tax such lands. In many instances the States have taxed the lands on which our custom-houses and other public buildings have been constructed, and such taxes have been paid by the Federal Government. This applies only to lands owned by the Government as a proprietor, the jurisdiction never having been ceded by the State.

* * * * * * *

The proprietorship of land in a State by the General Government, can not, it would seem, enlarge its sovereignty or restrict the sovereignty of the State. This sovereignty extends to the State limits over the territory of the State, subject only to the proprietary right of the lands owned by the Federal Government, and the right to dispose of such lands and protect them, under such regulations as it may deem proper. (P. 533.)

The State organizes its territory into counties and townships, and regulates its process throughout its limits. And in the discharge of the ordinary functions of sovereignty, a State has a right to provide for intercourse between the citizens, commercial and otherwise, in every part of the State, by the establishment of easements, whether they may be common roads, turnpike, plank, or railroads. The kind of easement must depend upon the discretion of the legislature. And this power extends over the lands owned by the United States as to those owned by individuals.

This power, it is believed, has been exercised by all the States in which the public lands have been situated. It is a power which belongs to the State, and the exercise of which is essential to the prosperity and advancement of the country. State and county roads have been established and constructed over the public lands in a State under the laws of the State, without any doubt of its power, and with the acquiescence of the Federal Government. In this respect the lands of the public have been treated and appropriated by the State as the land of individuals. These easements have so manifestly conduced to the public interest that no objection from any quarter, has hitherto been made. And it is believed that this power belongs to the State. (P. 534.)

He died rather too soon to settle this question, perhaps.

The right of eminent domain appertains to a State sovereignty, and it is exercised free from the restraints of the Federal Constitution. The property of individuals is subject to this right, and no reason is perceived why the aggregate property, in a State, of the individuals of the Union, should not also be subject to it. The principle is the same, and the beneficial result to the proprietors is the same in proportion to their interests. These easements have their source in State power and do not belong to Federal action. They are necessary for the public at large and essential to the interests of the people of the State.

The powers of a State to construct a road necessarily implies the right, not only to appropriate the line of the road, but the materials necessary for its construction and use.

Mr. NELSON. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that it is not necessary to read from the decision. That part of the law no one will dispute. It simply relates to the right of eminent——

Mr. TELLER. This is a part of the law they do dispute.

Mr. NELSON. I mean nobody in this Chamber disputes it. It is not disputed here. The State may have the right of eminent domain to lay out public roads. I am not disputing that. But does the Senator from Colorado dispute that the Government has the right to take care of these forests on its own land? Has it no right to build for its use a road over its own land?

Mr. TELLER. The United States has the rights given to it by the Constitution, and none other.

Mr. NELSON. That is very indefinite. It does not answer the question.

Mr. TELLER. No; it is not, and it has been well settled by the Supreme Court that it extends to the care and preservation of its land; not to its use for any purpose, only its preservation. The court continues:

Whether we look to principle or the structure of the Federal and State governments or the uniform practice of the new States, there would seem to be no doubt that a State has the power to construct a public road through the public lands. (United States v. Railroad Bridge Company, p. 535, 6 McLean, Ill.)

Mr. NELSON. There is no dispute about that. I have not taken that stand, and there is no occasion for the Senator to inject that in my remarks, because I have not disputed that proposition.

Mr. TELLER. I am not injecting it into the Senator's remarks, and he can leave it out. I am presenting it here because that has been denied by the forest-reserve people. That is why I am presenting it.

Now, I want to say—and the Senator need not incorporate this in his remarks—that I have never doubted that the Government of the United States could take any measures necessary to protect its property by Congressional act, but I do deny that an individual executive officer of the Government has any right to legislate as to how the lands shall be preserved.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, in the act of June 4, 1897, the Secretary of the Interior was given full power to take care of the forest reserves. The Forestry Bureau was at that time, and for some years continued, under the Interior Department. It has since been transferred to the jurisdiction of the Agricultural Department. By legislation—and I will not take up the time to read it, for any Senator can consult the statutes of Congress on the subject—Congress has given full jurisdiction and authority to the Department of Agriculture, through its Forestry Service, to conserve and take care of the timber lands. Those lands are lands of the Government. If the Government deems it wise, for the interest of the people of this country, to preserve those forests, it has the right to take all the necessary steps to carry out that policy. If it is necessary to build roads through its own lands, it has the same right to build a road through its own lands as I have to construct a road through my land. If it desires in an extensive forest reserve to have telephone and telegraph lines, by which its men who are watching the reserve from one side to the other can communicate with each other, it has a perfect right to construct them. If it has men there who have charge of the forest reserves and who have to watch them and stay there, it is proper for the Government to furnish them with a place in which to live. If for the preservation of the forests it is necessary to regulate the pasture in those forests, it is simply a necessity that goes with the subject-matter and pertains to it.

The same principle applies in that matter as in the matter of interpreting the Constitution. Given the power, as Chief Justice Marshall said, to be exercised in a given direction, Congress or the Government has a right to exercise all reasonable and rational means to carry it out. Given the power to the Federal Government to establish a forest reserve on its own lands, and the Government of the United States must inevitably have the power to take all necessary steps for the purpose of protecting the timber on its reserves.

Now, another proposition. The Senator from Idaho read from the constitution of that State, and I undertook to set him right on one point, and the Senator from Colorado thought I was wrong. I said that in respect of water courses and streams in a forest reserve, the Government of the United States stood exactly in the position of a riparian owner. By that I do not mean that a riparian owner has a larger right than the State. I simply mean that in one of the States or Territories, be it a State where they have the doctrine of prior appropriation or a State where they have the common-law doctrine as to riparian rights, in either case the Government of the United States with a stream flowing through its lands has exactly the same rights in the waters of that stream that I would have if I owned the land. I can refer——

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me to finish this part of my remarks I will yield.

I want to call attention to the decision of the Supreme Court in 174 United States, the title of the case being "The United States v. The Rio Grande Irrigation Company." Here is what the court says, the opinion being rendered by Mr. Justice Brewer.

Mr. TELLER. I call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota——

Mr. NELSON. Let me first finish this quotation, and then I will yield.

Mr. TELLER. That was a case in a Territory, and if the Senator reads it he will find that it is confined entirely to the Territory of New Mexico—absolutely.

Mr. NELSON. Here is the doctrine. Let me quote it, and if the Senator thinks the court is wrong, he can correct the court. Here is what the court says:

> Although this power of changing the common-law rule as to streams within its dominion undoubtedly belongs to each State, yet two limitations must be recognized: First, that in the absence of specific authority from Congress a State can not by its legislation destroy the right of the United States as the owner of lands bordering on a stream, to the continued flow of its waters, so far, at least, as may be necessary for the beneficial uses of the Government property. Second, that it is limited by the superior power of the General Government to secure the uninterrupted navigability of all navigable streams within the limits of the United States. In other words, the jurisdiction of the General Government over interstate commerce and its natural highways vests in that Government the right to take all needed measures to preserve the navigability of the navigable water courses of the country even against any State action. (174 U. S., p. 703; United States v. Rio Grande Irrigation Company.)

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator permit me to finish this part, and then I will yield.

I agree with the Senator from Colorado to this extent: That where the Government has parted with the title to land within a State, land on the borders of a navigable stream, the title to the water in that stream is either in the State or in the riparian owners, or in both, and not in the Federal Government, except for purposes of navigation. But where in a given tract the Government of the United States still owns the land on both sides through which a stream flows, the Government of the United States, in respect of that stream, stands in the position that any other proprietor in any of the States of this Union would, and it would be a strange doctrine if it did not—if the United States could not have the rights and privileges in respect to the water of that stream that an ordinary proprietor or owner would have.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator if he understands from the authority he has read that the United States has any right to the water on land that it owns superior to what a private individual in the same State would have to the water on land that he owns?

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator had listened to my remarks, he would have understood me. I say the Government of the United States, in respect to its own land, stands exactly in the position of any other riparian proprietor and has the same rights under the laws of your State, or in all the Western States, that any private proprietor has. You can no more divest the United States of its right in the water on land that it is the proprietor of than you can divest any other owner.

Mr. FULTON. I agree with the Senator, but it is not a governmental right; it is a mere property right. It is simply the right of property, that is all.

Mr. NELSON. It is a right appurtenant to the land. The rule laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States is that after the Government has parted with the title to the land bordering a stream the rights of the riparian owner are governed by the laws of the State, and those laws are different. Some States hold that the riparian owner's land extends only to high-water mark, some to low-water mark, and some to the thread of the stream; but whatever the rule may be in any State, it is goverened by the laws of that State after the Federal Government has parted with the title.

Mr. FULTON. I am sure that I agree as a matter of State policy, but while the Government still owns the land through which the stream flows, its rights are subject to regulation by the laws of the State the same as the rights of the individual who owns the land.

Mr. NELSON. Exactly the same. It stands in the same position with any other riparian owner. I have never contended for anything else.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Naturally and originally the Government of the United States had a right to the water that an individual had. It had no more and no less. In 1866 the Government of the United States passed an act that took away from the Government riparian rights, because it passed an act for the use of the water.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken. I can give you the law. In 1866 the United States Government, by Congress, recognized the doctrine of what was known as that of the "prior appropriation of water" prevailing in the arid and mining States. It recognized what the courts and the custom of miners had tolerated and recognized for years; that is all.

Mr. TELLER. The Government ceased to have any riparian rights after the act of 1866; but if it did have them, in 1876, when the State of Colorado was admitted, it provided in its constitution that there should be no longer the doctrine of riparian rights in that State. That constitution was approved by the Government of the United States, and it became the law of the land; and in the Kansas case the court plainly recognized the doctrine that the Government has no right as a riparian owner in that land.

Mr. President, I do not know that I care to carry on this discussion. I have a brief on that subject, but I will not present it to-night.

Mr. NELSON. I have a brief in my head on that subject.

Mr. TELLER. Repeatedly after 1866 the Government recognized by acts of Congress the right of the prior proprietor of water to the use of it under the State law. It recognized it in the act of reclamation under the State law. There can not be any question about it.

Mr. NELSON. I have already stated to the Senator that that was recognized by the act of 1866. The law that prevails in the State of Colorado, incorporated in the constitution, and which prevails in all the arid and mining States, is simply changing the doctrine of the common law in respect to the rights of riparian proprietors. Under the bald principles of the common law the rule was that the riparian owner on a running stream could not use or divert the water so as to diminish the supply or deteriorate it to the lower owner. In your State and the other mining States you have the doctrine of prior appropriation. That doctrine affects private owners and the Government of the United States. I do not contend that there is any different rule. I simply say that in respect to the water courses on its own land in your State the United States stands exactly as any private citizen, exactly as I or the Senator from Colorado would stand if we owned the land.

I am unwilling to take up the time of the Senate too much, but I can not help referring to a part of the grievance of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. I do not see him in his seat. He spoke of the fact that the Government was pasturing this land, and there were school sections in it. He said the Government had been collecting money for pasturing the school land within the reserve and had paid it to the State.

Now, that is not the case at all. The Senator is in error. Under the last two appropriation acts, at the first session and the second session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, we provided that 10 per cent of all that was realized from forest reserves, whether from timber or from pasturage, should go to the State for the benefit of the county in which the forest reserve was situated. In the last act on the subject we provided that there should be an apportionment in case the forest reserve was in two States. The fund the Senator from Idaho referred to was the proceeds that came from that source, and not from the pasturage of school lands.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly; and I owe the Senator an apology for not yielding as soon as he rose.

Mr. BORAH. That is all right. I simply wish to say the position my colleague takes is that the Government exercises control and dominion over these school sections and leases them; that is to say, it leases a certain portion of territory and takes the sheep upon that territory, and, as my colleague says, the sheep have not yet been able to distinguish the line between the sections which relate to Government ownership and those which relate to the State. So the result of it is that the Government gets the benefit of pasturage over the entire domain, including the school sections.

Mr. NELSON. That may be so, but the Senator can see how it works and how it is difficult practically to obviate it.

The Government establishes a considerable forest reserve. Inside of that forest reserve there may be some school sections. The school lands can not exceed over two sections to the township, that is one-eighteenth of the land within a township. The Government in taking in cattle and sheep to pasture on its forest reserve can not very well segregate the school lands from the other. They let in so many cattle. I presume the State would have a right to ask something for the pasturage of this land. The Government is not leasing the land. It charges so much a head for the privilege of letting the stock come on the reserve, and because of the fact that the land can not be segregated I can see how some of the school sections may be pastured.

There was another matter the Senator was in error about, and that is that the State had no right to relinquish the land. If any of those school lands are within a forest reserve and the State of Idaho sees fit it can relinquish its right to those lands and under the statute of 1891, which I have here on my desk, a general statute, it can select other lands. Certain it is that the Federal Government has no right to interfere with the timber on the school sections, and I do not think it will be shown that that has been the case.

I can very well see how our friends out West in the forest-reserve States feel, and probably I myself would feel just the same way. Before the Government established these forest reserves and took charge of them, the settlers could pasture their cattle, they could go there and take timber, and do anything under the sun except to kneel down and ask for the grace of God.

But now the Government intervenes for the conservation of the timber. They say to these settlers, "We can only allow a limited amount of cattle and sheep in here and you must pay a little something to cover the expenses of maintaining the forest reserve."

In respect to the sale of timber, the Senator from Idaho said the Government was owning the lumber industry. The Government is doing nothing of the kind. It sells the dead and down timber and the mature timber. If the sale amounts to less than $50, it can be sold by a subordinate without advertising. I believe a ranger can sell $50 worth and no more without an advertisement of the dead and down and mature timber. The supervisor, the one next above him, can sell to the amount of $100. But when it comes to an amount in excess of that it must be advertised and sold to the highest bidder. So the Government is well and amply protected.

Now, it may be (and I will not dispute the Senators on that point) that some of these little lordlings dressed in pea green, as the Senator from Idaho describes them, with a green plume in their hats, and so forth, may have been a little rude, may have put on a little assumed dignity; but Senators know that that is not a thing which occurs only on a forest reserve. We see here in the city of Washington, right at our elbow, every day, some fellow with a little brief petty authority putting on a more lordly air than a United States Senator. [Laughter.] If the Senator from Idaho wants my cooperation to prevent those rangers from wearing pea-green suits, or from wearing plumes, or from putting on so much dignity, he has my hearty sympathy, and I will help him to the best of my ability. But beyond that, Mr. President, I can not go.

I feel that the Government has embarked upon a policy that in connection with the Reclamation Service will populate the big arid regions you see there [indicating] at the foot of the Rocky Mountains on the east side. I am a little selfish and a little patriotic. I want that country settled up as rapidly as possible with good American citizens, even though they are Norwegians. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. President, if we want to settle up that country rapidly and make it productive, as prosperous and as happy as the lands in the immediate Mississippi Valley, the way to do it is not only to give them the land and the water, but to have timber close by, so that they will have something to supply them in the early days of their venture on their claims. I can excuse some of the Senators. I can myself imagine if I lived in the State of Idaho with the great green place shown there on the map I would feel a little nervous and mettlesome about having so much green around me. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. President, in this matter we will have to disabuse ourselves of the spirit of our environment. We will have to look after the general welfare of the country and to the good of the American people. If we have that end in view (and I think the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Colorado will be as happy to take that view of it as any of us), we can not help but say, Godspeed to the Forestry Service. It is now established. Mr. Pinchot has done a great work. He has organized that service. He has it on a good footing. If there is anything in it that needs pruning, that needs correcting, I am ready to join any one of the Senators. I do not want any tyranny or any arbitrary power in this country, but I just want enough of it Mr. President, to protect that fine body of timber, the only remnant that the Federal Government has left.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I do not desire at this hour to enter upon an elaborate discussion of the agricultural appropriation bill, and I would not speak at all if it were not for the fact that earlier in the week I felt moved in that direction, and I have been waiting with such patience as I could command until others better entitled to address the Senate upon this subject and that infinite variety of subjects which have been found kindred to it had delivered their observations.

I have served ever since I have been here upon the Committee on Agriculture, and I have been troubled in my mind at every session by the fact that around these appropriations made for the American farm and those objects which are associated with modern agriculture practically all the debates about our appropriations have circled. The great appropriations pass peacefully through this body, almost without explanation, and practically without debate. Yet every year, for some reason that I have never been able to understand, when an appropriation for the maintenance of the Department of Agriculture comes before the Senate the spirit of free speech seems to run riot in this Chamber, and days and weeks are consumed in a criticism which I have sometimes thought not altogether friendly not only to the provisions which we are debating now, but to practically the whole scheme of the agricultural appropriation.

I am one of those who not only have confidence in the administration of the Department of Agriculture, but I have a very definite confidence in the wisdom and skill with which the estimates for that Department are made and with which the appropriations are passed by Congress.

It has been said that the Department of Agriculture asks these vast sums of money without deigning to give to the Senate an estimate of its needs. The only trouble about a statement of that sort is that it is wanting in those elements of truth which give substance and dignity to our remarks, even in the Senate of the United States.

The estimates for the Department of Agriculture are regularly made upon the suggestion of the Department through the Secretary of the Treasury and are a part of the literature of this session of Congress. They are not only made in gross or in bulk, but if anybody will examine the estimates it will be found that they are made in detail, as the law requires, not possibly in so perfect detail as is the case in other Departments, because much of the work of the Department is in the very nature of things incapable of being resolved in that way into particulars.

That is no uncommon thing in the appropriations of Congress. There is no great appropriation bill considered in this Chamber in which a vast bulk of appropriations are not made without any designation either in the estimates or in the appropriation act itself as to the details and the specific application of specific sums of the money appropriated.

Take the building of a ship. Millions of dollars are appropriated to that without a word further. Take the building of a great public edifice. Millions of dollars are appropriated for that purpose without going further into details. When you come to the Post-Office Department, the vast enterprises of that Department are provided for in appropriations that carry not millions but tens of millions of money appropriated in bulk and applied, so far as particulars are concerned, altogether within the discretion of the Post-Office Department.

In the case which we have been debating here, in the very nature of it, the appropriation could not be in more definite detail than the pending bill presents. This is an enterprise in which the Department of Agriculture is engaged. It is a great business, for which Congress is making provision. The bulk appropriation that has been estimated for and which is carried by this appropriation bill is the working capital of a business of infinite variety that could not be divided into particulars and brought in detail to the attention of the Congress of the United States.

It is perfectly evident to those of us who have followed the hearings, as I trust some of us have at least, both in the House and in the Senate, what this appropriation is for. We made an appropriation similar in amount last year, and by direction of the Congress the Secretary of Agriculture has given us a detailed statement of the expenditure of every dollar of it. Every man's name who drew a dollar by way of salary or day's work pay from the Treasury on the credit of that fund is put down here, and every dollar of it that was paid is recorded in strict detail in accordance with the suggestion of the act of Congress.

And yet, whether it has been intended or not, the atmosphere of this Chamber, never altogether perfect, has been infected at least by a suspicion that there are loose business methods, that there are faulty administrations, that for aught we know there may be peculations and defalcations, and all these evil things covered up by this bulk appropriation. I deny it in toto in every particular. All these items have been fairly accounted for; the exact use to which these moneys have been put is set down in this report; and no man has taken a dollar of it without a strict accounting by the Department of Agriculture.

I myself think that the appropriation which we make in this bill is not sufficient. I would be glad to see the sum doubled, because I have taken the pains to find out that vast savings have already been made by the care with which the Department has guarded these vast properties of the Government of the United States. We ought not to forget that we have now isolated from the public domain nearly 200,000,000 acres of this forest land scattered in many States and in many latitudes.

Mr. NELSON. One hundred and fifty millions.

Mr. DOLLIVER. My own calculation makes it nearly 200,000,000 acres, but if the acreage is less and the project proceeds, as I hope to see it proceed, it will certainly ultimately reach 200,000,000 acres of land.

Here is an empire, the property of the United States, and the object of this appropriation is to enable the Government of the United States to take care of it. If any man thinks that a million dollars per year for the care and protection of this vast domain, infinite in its resources and in its actual commercial value, is excessive, he has a rather queer notion of what constitutes business prudence in a world like this. By the care and diligence of the Government more millions of dollars were saved by the stopping of fires in these forests last year than will be spent within our lifetime in the defense and protection of these forests.

I undertake to say that there must underlie this debate some secret enthusiasm which is not patent upon the face of the record or upon the transactions which have been had by our Government toward the forests. I have been trying to understand as well as I could what motive there is behind the opposition to the forestry policy of the United States. I have noticed one thing, that very few people come forward affirmatively and deny the wisdom of the policy. The attacks upon it are usually accompanied by apologies and suggestions that they are not inspired by any unfriendly motive or feeling toward the policy itself; and yet if these attacks had no other motive than hostility to the whole policy they could hardly be more elaborate, and certainly they could not be more damaging than they have already been.

The forestry policy has survived the indifference and ignorance of its friends. I hope it will be able to survive the malice of its enemies. I am less hopeful that it will be able to survive these underhand, sidewise insinuations coming from all directions against the wisdom of the system.

For myself I have no doubt about the wisdom of it. I have made a practical study as a traveler and observer of our country, not only of what has happened to us in the past, but of what is now happening to us in the present day. I have traveled as a patient student of the forestry question over the burned districts of Wisconsin, over the burned districts of northern Michigan, over the burned districts of northern Minnesota, and I have seen spread out there, where every man could read it, an indictment against our wisdom and prudence as statesmen and lawmakers which would convict us before the public opinion of the whole world.

There has never been in the history of human society as completely organized a crime against the human race as the destruction of the American forests in Pennsylvania, in New York, in Michigan, in Wisconsin, in Minnesota; and to make the crime all the more ignoble, it was based upon greed and avarice and the love of money, which we are taught is the root of all evil. So it has proved in that vast public domain. It was despoiled by the spoilers who violate the land laws of the United States, and the witnesses still stand there in the burned trunks of great trees, in this pathetic tangled mass of burned logs and vegetable matter scattered over square miles of territory that, if it had been administered with wisdom and patriotism, might to-day be the permanent source of a lumber supply to us and to our children's children.

I for one do not want to see that mistake, that crime against mankind, repeated in the Rocky Mountain region; and I am glad that on the Pacific coast and in the intermountain region men have come forward to speak in the Senate and in the House of Representatives with a farsighted vision not only of these days of which we are a part, but of times after we have passed off this scene of action. I have studied the Forest Service in practically all the Rocky Mountain regions.

I especially found pleasure in studying it in the great State of Oregon, stopping at nearly every town of importance in the State. I have wandered up into the mountains and come in contact with forest rangers and with painted signs with which the Government control of the forest reserves is marked. I was not insulted by anyone; I was met with kindness and friendly interest upon all hands. I saw the signs on great trees: "Forest Reservation. Beware of Fires;" and a recitation of the regulations against setting out fires and against certain other violations of the police regulations which had been established in those reservations. I found there an organized scheme to do for Oregon and for Idaho and for that far-off Western coast of ours what, if it had been done for the Eastern States, would have been an infinite blessing from generation unto generation; and yet, side by side with these magnificent forests, I found this same petulant atmosphere of complaint, hostility arising from one source and another. I found that it was attributable in the main part to the disappointment of gentlemen—good people, I have no doubt—who had enjoyed for many years an undisturbed range for sheep and for cattle on these public domains, and in many cases an undisturbed opportunity to steal from the public forests whatever they needed either for the comfort of their families or for the prosperity of their business. I found those gentlemen gathered around in the villages at the foot of these mountain gorges complaining to me that this forest business was the worst fraud that the Government of the United States has ever embarked in. I do not take that view of it; but I found intelligent stockmen in those mountains who took the very opposite view of it, and I had the privilege, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture, to cross-examine scores of representatives of the live-stock interests of the United States who appeared before the committee; and I made up my mind that it is just as well to put the live-stock business in this intermountain region upon a solid and legitimate basis as it is to leave it as it has been left for so many years to the diligence and to the avarice of individual stock breeders and stock growers.

Why should not the use of our public domain be regulated? Everybody familiar with the pasturage lands of the United States knows that they have been practically destroyed by overgrazing; that they have been tramped until the very roots of the grasses have been destroyed; and what controversies have arisen between the people trying to pasture sheep and the people pasturing cattle, which have resulted in chaos and anarchy over whole sections of the country, in civil war in some sections of the United States, as graphically described by a reliable witness before the Committee on Agriculture at the last session of Congress. He said the cattlemen got up on top of the hills with loaded guns and cannon, and as the sheep came up from the valleys, as the great herd appeared in sight, he said, "they dealt them misery," using his exact language—that is to say, killed not only the sheep, but the shepherds. In the midst of that riot of practical civil war the cattle and sheep business of a great section of the United States has been conducted for nearly a generation.

Now, then, the Government owns this land. It has a right to take care of it, to say the least about it; and it is proposed to lease these pasturage lands in the forest for two reasons: First, in order that they may not be overgrazed, and in the next place, that a little revenue may be derived from them to maintain the forest policy upon which we have entered.

I favor all that. I want to see it indorsed, and I should like to see it not only applied to forest reservations, but applied to all the public pasture lands of the United States. I should like to see the cattle and sheep business put upon a legitimate and substantial basis.

I know from conversation upon the ground with those interested, that at present it is the rule of the strongest, and that the poor people, without means to press their claims, are kept out altogether, while the cattle barons, with their vast herds, practically occupy and monopolize the domain that ought, at least, to be divided with all the settlers interested in the cattle and in the sheep business. For that reason I hope to see the time come when Congress, taking counsel of the distinguished Senators who represent that section of the country, will in some practical way put these lands at the disposal of the live-stock interests in an orderly way, at a nominal rental, so that the lands themselves may be preserved and the business of producing live stock may be made to prosper all through that section of the country.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator from Iowa would give me a list of all the cattle barons who are not in favor of his system. I do not know a cattle baron in the West who is not in favor of leasing the public lands, and I do not know a farmer in the West who is in favor of it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I will call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the hearings had at the last session before the Committee on Agriculture, where names and arguments are recorded in a supply at least equal to the Senator's demand.

Mr. TELLER. I presume some of those people said they were not in favor of it; but the great cattle barons and the great cattle organizations of Oregon have declared for it and passed resolutions in favor of it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have no prejudices on the subject of cattle barons. I think a man who does a big live-stock business may be as respectable as a man who does a little live-stock business. My notion is that the business itself ought to be placed upon a substantial basis, so that a man's right to pasturage and the maintenance of his flocks and herds might be regulated by law and not by force.

Mr. TELLER. I called the Senator's attention to that because he seemed to be making an argument that we who do not agree in the leasing are governed by the cattle barons.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say that 90 per cent of the cattle barons are with the Senator.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Such an imputation as that was very far from any purpose of mine. I understand perfectly well that the Senator from Colorado in this matter, as in all other matters, is governed by the highest motives and by his own sense of what is right; and yet I am afraid that he and some other friends of mine, against whom I would be the last man to utter even a suspicion, have been colored in their prejudices by the clamors of surrounding populations and have expressed rather a temporary and shortsighted view of a question that really includes all generations to come in the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I rather think, perhaps, that there is a great majority of cattle barons in favor of the proposition of forest leasing, while, on the other hand, I think there is a great majority of sheep owners who are opposed to it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I did not speak of the sheep men, because I do not know anything about the sheep men, and I do not pretend to; but I do know about the cattlemen. Colorado is not a sheep country, except in the extreme southern part, on the New Mexican border. I know very little about the sheep business compared with what I know about the cattle business.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Now, a word further. What is this $500,000 asked for? It is asked by the Chief Forester upon the estimate of the Department, because he has to have a working capital to carry on the business that he is engaged in—the necessary business incident to the administration of the forests. Originally he could take the proceeds of the pastures he rented and of the timber which he sold and use them to pay the current expenses as a substitute for capital stock for the transaction of this business. But very properly, I think, Congress now requires every dollar that he takes in to be covered directly into the Treasury; and, therefore, without this appropriation he would be without means to take any steps toward caring for or protecting these vast property interests. I do not believe for a moment that any Senator will leave the Government of the United States in a position of being charged with the responsibility of nearly 200,000,000 acres of these valuable lands without an adequate appropriation to enable the Department of Agriculture to take care of them and to protect them with at least a partial care.

It requires a good deal of money to take care of them economically. These lands are scattered far and wide. In the nature of the case only a few rangers can be placed upon them. If fires break out, it is important that there should be means of instantaneous communication from one part of the reserve to another, so that the rangers may gather their forces and all appear at the place of danger. That can be provided for only by an elaborate system of telephone wires and poles throughout the forest domain. There must be places for the rangers to live. They can very cheaply construct houses in the forests for their homes, or, at least, for their headquarters. There must be bridges. Often a fire will occur miles away from the place where the ranger's hut is. If he could have a direct route to it, he would be possibly within a mile, but by reason of the canyons, the unfordable streams, and the impassable marshes in the interim between his position and the place of the fire, it becomes impossible for the ranger to reach it. So that the economical administration of the forest requires roadways. It requires oftentimes bridges; it requires the removal of obstructions in footpaths that follow through the mountains. It is for these reasons that this money is absolutely necessary.

I would a good deal rather a man would stand up and say "This forest policy is unnecessary; I am against it; it is a wrong policy," than to leave the Forester without means to take care of these vast interests after the United States has taken them under its protection.

I am not one of those disposed to criticise the Chief Forester. I know him with only a very limited acquaintance, but I have taken a little opportunity to study some of his history and his biography. I regard him as a providential man for the United States. We maintain a good many schools and colleges here, but it was not until he came on the scene that we produced anybody that was willing to turn aside from the emoluments of the great professions and from the opportunities of business in all departments of life to take up an obscure and misunderstood scientific pursuit and stick by it until he arrived at a position to be of service to the whole community of the United States. I confess I rather like the biography of that man, and I am not without a certain sense of irritation when he is referred to as a man calculated to encourage the actions of foresters which have been complained of here. On the contrary, unless I have altogether mistaken his character, if Senators would take the same pains to bring to his attention or to the attention of the Secretary of Agriculture the offensive actions which have caused irritation in the minds of so many of our colleagues here, I think they would get them corrected without the slightest difficulty in the world; for, if I have not misunderstood this man, he is a typical American gentleman, a man who would not encourage or tolerate on the part of the employees under him conduct unbecoming to an official of the United States.

And if I have not misunderstood altogether that fine old Scotchman who presides over the Department of Agriculture, you could not present to him a case of hardship arising in the matter of a homestead settler such as was referred to by my friend from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] without at once arousing an indignation in his mind that would result in more reforms than are likely to be produced by these speeches in the Senate. So that to my mind these are incidental matters that can be corrected without noise or clamor or vituperative criticism of any sort; and I do not believe they have any place in this debate.

I think the question is greater than all this. I know of no question with which we of our generation have to do greater than this question—the question of preserving the natural resources for the use of the people, not only for the present, but for future generations. I am not alarmed as some are about the ruin of the forests, being likely to destroy the building material of the United States. I inherited a very comfortable theology, the general central principle of which is, that God made this world that we are living in and made it well and administers it in a general way; and I, for one, do not believe that He ever made a permanent world with a temporary supply of fuel or light or building material or any other necessity of human life. On the contrary, when an estimate was made not so many years ago by an American scientist that within one hundred and fifty years the coal supply of the whole world would be destroyed, the most famous English student of practical natural science answered that within one hundred and fifty years the use of coal will be unknown in the world because it will be superseded by other means of power and heat and light.

I feel the same way about the timber supply of the United States. I think that scientists are now at work that have already written the doom of the American lumber yard. I believe the time is within sight when the use of lumber in the construction of houses to dwell in or in the construction of the great buildings that constitute the pride of our mighty cities, will be practically unknown. In the capital of my State the most costly residences are now being builded without the use of lumber at all.

Granolithic cement, which is a distinct step of progress in building construction in our time, is gradually abolishing the use of lumber even for the ordinary outbuildings that surround the American farm. Already our lumber sidewalks are gone, and in five years our lumber barns and outbuildings on farms will be gone, and every one of us is likely to live to see the total disappearance of the use of lumber in the domestic architecture of the people of the United States. Therefore I am not one of those interested in preserving the forests from destruction for this reason alone, but my reading leads me to believe that this world is somewhat on an equilibrium. You can not destroy the forests of the country without interfering with its climate and with its other natural forces. I have lived in a country that since it was plowed, since the sloughs were drained, and since the surface vegetation has been converted to the uses of agriculture has seen a gradual drying up of its rivers. The city of Pittsburg is every spring overflowed by a river that in the summer time is practically without water, although once a great highway of American commerce; and there is not a practical student of the question that does not understand that it arises from the destruction of the forests in the mountains of West Virginia, those mighty water supplies that for generations and for centuries and millenniums have been the Divine method of carrying down the floods to those rivers. To-day the rains fall, the floods descend, our cities are buried, and our commerce is interrupted, and we are at the very beginning of these perils in the valley of the Ohio River.

I do not want to see the same thing done in the valley of the Mississippi River. I was glad to hear the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] say that, in cooperation with the National Government, the State of Minnesota is protecting by modern scientific methods the headwaters of the Mississippi River. I have visited the headwaters of the Missouri River, and I want to see preserved the forests that were put there for the purpose of safeguarding the sources of that great river. I went by slow stages three summers ago down the valley of the Sacramento River, in California.

I found lumbermen huddled around the base of Mount Shasta with contracts to cut hundreds of millions of feet of those mighty forests that God Himself put there to guard the source of the Sacramento River, and I said to myself and to everybody that I talked with out there, "Unless the people take more interest in their children and in the future of their community than they do in their sawmills, that mighty country, now prosperous and hopeful for the future, will become a desert within three generations."

And yet we have men introducing the forest ranger with his bad manners, the sheep herder with his desire to get in among these trees for nothing, the cattleman unaccustomed to pay for what he gets on the public domain, and a dozen other trifling circumstances to prejudice and even to put a stop to the policy which, in my humble judgment, lies at the basis of any intelligent foresight for the future of the great populations that are to live in the intermountain and coast country of the United States.

I stand for this bill. I wish the appropriation was larger. If a motion is made to make it larger, I shall have no hesitation in voting for it. But I ask the Senate not to make it less, because it certainly is bad business as well as questionable patriotism to require the Department of Agriculture to care for and protect 200,000,000 acres of forest land, and then take away from it the money that is necessary even to enter upon an intelligent discharge of the duties which the law imposes upon it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there are other large appropriation bills which I understand are ready to follow the one we are considering. I desire to get through with this as early as possible, and to that end I ask unanimous consent that when we adjourn to-day it be until 11 o'clock to-morrow, and that then we may take up this bill immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BURKETT. I desire to ask the Senator from Wyoming if that is intended to do away with the morning hour to-morrow?

Mr. KEAN. It is.

Mr. WARREN. I had so intended, because during the morning hour sometimes a debate springs up that involves one or two hours, and takes up the time until 2 o'clock, so that I might not be sure of any time before 2 o'clock.

Mr. FORAKER. I suppose if we meet at 11 o'clock the morning hour will expire at 1 o'clock.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. BURKETT. To-morrow is Saturday, and it seems to me we ought to have a morning hour. I have no objection to meeting at 11 o'clock.

Mr. WARREN. I have no desire to cut off any particular business that the Senator may have. I wish, however, in some way we might have an agreement to take up the appropriation bill as early as possible.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest to the Senator that a motion be made that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at, say, half past 10 or 11 o'clock to-morrow, and that the morning hour extend not beyond the hour of 12 o'clock.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps unanimous consent would be given to that. I will ask it in that way, then.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the morning hour to-morrow extend not beyond 12 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming asks that the morning hour to-morrow shall not extend beyond 12 o'clock.

Mr. FORAKER. At the hour of 12 o'clock the unfinished business will be laid before the Senate.

Mr. KEAN. The appropriation bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I mean the unfinished business.

Mr. WARREN. I presume the Senator wishes that the unfinished business shall retain its place. There is no objection to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the morning hour to-morrow close at 12 o'clock.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest as an amendment that the morning hour close not later than 12 o'clock. It may close before that time.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire whether or not under the rules we can not do that by motion? We can do it by unanimous consent, but I doubt if we can change the rule as to the morning hour——

Mr. WARREN. I have put it in that form. I have asked unanimous consent.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh. A motion was suggested by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Montana suggests that it be not later than 12 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the morning hour to-morrow shall close not later than 12 o'clock and also that the pending bill be taken up for consideration immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill after the Senate shall have disposed of the pending appropriation measure.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, May 9, 1908, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 8, 1908.

The recess having expired, the House, at 11 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m., was called to order by the Speaker.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules on the pending motion and passing the bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] suggests there is no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] There are fifty-six Members present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members; as many as are in favor of the motion will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and as many as are opposed will answer "nay;" those present and not voting will answer "present," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 214, nays 44, answered "present" 14, not voting 115.

ADDITIONAL AIDS TO NAVIGATION.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 20784 as amended.

The bill, as amended, was read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20784) to authorize additional aids to navigation in the Light-House Establishment, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish and provide the following additional aids to navigation in the Light-House Establishment under the Light-House Board in the Department of Commerce and Labor, in accordance with the respective limits of cost hereinafter respectively set forth, which shall in no case be exceeded:

FIRST LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICT.

A tender for use in the first light-house district and elsewhere as may be directed, at a cost not to exceed $200,000.

THIRD LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICT.

A light and fog-signal station at or near Negro Point, on Wards Island, Hellgate, East River, New York, at a cost not to exceed $10,000.

A light and signal or whistling buoy fitted with submarine bell off Point Judith, Rhode Island, at a cost not to exceed $9,000.

A light and signal or whistling buoy fitted with submarine bell, to be placed at or near the entrance to the dredged channel at Greenville, N. J., in New York Bay, at a cost not to exceed $9,000.

A new spar shop, at a cost not to exceed $3,000, and a wooden dump scow, at a cost not to exceed $7,500, at the general light-house depot, Tompkinsville, N. Y.

A storehouse and dock at San Juan, P. R., at a cost not to exceed $15,000.

FOURTH LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICT.

The limit of cost for a light and fog-signal station on Elbow of Cross Ledge, Delaware Bay, New Jersey, authorized by an act approved April 28, 1904, is hereby increased by the sum of $21,500, so as to make the limit of cost $96,500 instead of $75,000, as heretofore authorized.

The Schooner Ledge range lights, Delaware River, Pennsylvania, may be moved, so as to comply with the change in position of the dredged channel of the Delaware River, at a cost not to exceed $10,650.

Range lights, Reedy Island, Delaware River. Delaware and New Jersey, at a cost not to exceed $25,000 in addition to the amounts heretofore appropriated.

A temporary light at Goose Island Flats, Delaware River, Delaware, at a cost not to exceed $15,000. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the establishment of a light and fog-signal station at Goose Island Flats, Delaware River, in the act of March 3, 1905, to be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury.

Post lights on Delaware River between Bordentown and Trenton, N. J., at a cost not to exceed $500.

FIFTH LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICT.

One buoy to be placed off Cape Henry; one buoy to be placed to the northward of the Middle Ground near the entrance to Chesapeake Bay, and one relief buoy, all to be light and signal or whistling buoys, each fitted with submarine bell, at a cost for the three buoys not to exceed $27,000.

For a post-lantern light, at or near the mouth of Lower Broad Creek, North Carolina, at a cost not to exceed $500.

The limit of cost for a light and fog-signal station at Ragged Point, Potomac River, Virginia, authorized by the act approved June 20, 1906, is hereby increased by the sum of $5,000, so as to make the total limit of cost $35,000 instead of $30,000, as heretofore authorized.

SIXTH LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICT.

A tender for the use of the engineer in the sixth light-house district and elsewhere, as may be directed, at a cost not to exceed $30,000.

A light and signal or whistling buoy, to be placed off the entrance to St. Johns River, Florida, and a relief buoy for same, at a cost not to exceed $18,000.

EIGHTH LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICT.

A light and fog-signal station at or near the end of Sabine Pass Jetty, at a cost not to exceed $40,000.

The limit of cost for light and fog-signal station at or near the outer end of one of the jetties at Galveston Harbor, as fixed by the act of June 11, 1896, is hereby increased by the sum of $10,000, so as to make the total limit of cost $45,000 instead of $35,000, as heretofore authorized.

A buoy wharf and depot shed at Fort San Jacinto, Tex., Military Reservation, Galveston Harbor, at a cost not to exceed $10,000.

NINTH LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICT.

A light vessel at Milwaukee Bay, Wisconsin, at a cost not to exceed $75,000.

A fog-signal station at Grand Point au Sable, Michigan, at a cost not to exceed $11,000.

TENTH LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICT.

A light station at each of the east and west breakwater pierheads, entrance to Cleveland Harbor, Ohio, at a cost not to exceed $45,000.

ELEVENTH LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICT.

The limit of cost of the relief light vessel for the ninth and eleventh light-house districts, authorized by the act approved March 3, 1903, is hereby increased by the sum of $20,000, so as to make the total limit of cost $50,000 instead of $30,000, as heretofore authorized.

The Light-House Board shall make survey and estimate the cost and report upon the feasibility and need of establishing a light and fog station on Gull Island, or the easterly end of Michigan Island, Apostle Group, and whether when said station is established the existing station on the westerly end of Michigan Island can be safely closed, such survey and report to cost not to exceed the sum of $2,000.

TWELFTH LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICT.

A light and fog-signal station at or near Four Mile Creek, near Punta Gorda, Cal., at a cost not to exceed $60,000.

A light and fog-signal station at some point on the northerly or westerly coast of Kauai Island, Hawaii, at a cost not to exceed $75,000.

THIRTEENTH LIGHT-HOUSE DISTRICT.

The Light-House Board shall survey and estimate the cost and report upon the feasibility and need of establishing a light-vessel or light station at or near Orford Reef, off Cape Blanco, Oregon, such survey and report to cost not to exceed the sum of $2,000.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is hereby authorized to enter into contract or contracts for any or all of the items provided for in section 1 of this act within the limits of cost therein respectively provided.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is hereby authorized to establish and provide in the Light-House Establishment at such places as shall, in the opinion of the Light-House Board, be for the best interests of the Light-House Service, two oil houses, at a cost not to exceed $1,500 for each one.

SEC. 4. That it is hereby made the duty of the Light-House Board to care for and maintain the anchorage buoys in New York Harbor and Philadelphia Harbor heretofore placed there by the United States.

SEC. 5. That any person, firm, company, or corporation required by law to maintain a light or lights upon any bridge or abutments over or in any navigable waters, who shall fail or refuse to maintain such light or lights, or to obey any of the lawful rules and regulations relating to the same shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be subject to a fine not exceeding the sum of $100 for each offense, and each day during which such violation shall continue shall be considered as a new offense.

SEC. 6. That it shall be unlawful for any person to obstruct or interfere with any aid to navigation established or maintained in the Light-House Establishment under the Light-House Board, or to anchor any vessel in any of the navigable waters of the United States so as to obstruct or interfere with range lights maintained therein, and any person violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be subject to a fine not exceeding the sum of $500 for each offense, and each day during which such violation shall continue shall be considered as a new offense.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall annually cause the Light-House Board to make a report to him for transmission to Congress of all aids to navigation in service which may be discontinued without distinct injury to the interests of navigation.

SEC. 8. That the Light-House Board is authorized to employ temporarily at Washington, not exceeding three draftsmen, to be paid at current rates, to prepare plans for the tenders and light vessels authorized by this act and to be paid from the respective appropriations therefor, such employment to terminate on or before the date when the plans for such tenders and vessels shall be finished and proposals for building them respectively are invited by advertisements.

SEC. 9. That every light-house keeper and assistant light-house keeper in the Light-House Establishment of the United States shall be entitled to receive one ration per day or, in the discretion of the Light-House Board, commutation therefor at the rate of 30 cents per ration.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule a second is considered as ordered. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill providing for additional aids to navigation for the Light-House Service, running from Maine to California, including one light-house in the Hawaiian Islands, and an additional provision for a light-house station in Porto Rico. The total authorization carried by the bill is $759,650; but the bill provides for one temporary light station at a cost of $15,000 in place of a light station heretofore authorized at a cost of $85,000 upon the Delaware River, so that that temporary light station is estimated will last for some considerable time.

In addition to the authorization for the general aid to navigation, there is a provision for a ration of 30 cents a day for the light-house keepers. That is practically an increase in the pay of the light-house keepers. Under the existing law the average pay of the light-house keepers can not exceed $50 per month. In some places the keepers are paid more than $50 a month, and in other places less; but the law provides an average of not exceeding $50 a month. As an actual fact, the average pay is $46 per month. We have recently increased the pay of the Life-Saving Service by a ration and by other provisions. This bill to that extent increases by the ration per day, or, where the Light-House Board shall authorize, a commutation of the ration. In some places it is undoubtedly more desirable to supply the ration in kind, because the light-house tender can deliver the ration without difficulty, and to the keeper it is a great matter of expense to obtain the ration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if any gentleman desires to make further inquiry, I will be glad to do the best I can to reply.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question or two about the bill. I am not posted on it. I see in section 5 of the bill—

That any person, firm, company, or corporation required by law to maintain a light or lights upon any bridge or abutments over or in any navigable waters, who shall fail or refuse to maintain such light or lights, or to obey any of the lawful rules and regulations relating to the same, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be subject to a fine not exceeding the sum of $100 for each offense, and each day during which such violation shall continue shall be considered as a new offense.

Now, I want to ask the gentleman this: Does that provision contemplate punishment for the violation of a rule now in force or a rule to be enacted hereafter?

Mr. MANN. I may say to the gentleman that where we pass bills for bridges over navigable streams—and of course they can only be located by direct or indirect consent of Congress—it is the practice to put in the bill and in the general bridge law a provision that these lights shall be maintained by the persons erecting the bridge in accordance with the rules and regulations to be promulgated by the Department or by the Light-House Board. Now, I think this provision will apply to the rules and regulations hereafter put in force, if they can lawfully be put in force.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what I desire to call the gentleman's attention to. It seems to me clear that we can not delegate to the Light-House Board our legislative authority to create a penal offense, and if we authorize them in the future to make rules and regulations that by virtue of their making becomes a crime, it is clearly unconstitutional; and if that is the construction of the provision, does it not jeopardize all of section 5, because it is all in the same provision? And could the Supreme Court separate what is constitutional and what is not constitutional?

Mr. MANN. It seems to me, and I am frank to say so, that in order to make the provisions of the bill effective at all, it was necessary to refer to the rules and regulations, because the laws that we passed heretofore provide for rules and regulations. I thought it was advisable not to take the unlimited chance of providing for rules and regulations. If the rules and regulations are lawful, we have a right to say that a violation of those rules and regulations shall be a misdemeanor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am satisfied the gentleman will find—I can not now refer to the authority, because I have not got it—that we can not pass a bill providing for rules and regulations to be made hereafter and make a violation of those rules and regulations a misdemeanor.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken in his recollection. The principal case on the subject is the case involving the cattle quarantine regulations in which the Supreme Court of the United States held that we could not delegate to the Secretary of Agriculture the power to make regulations and then punish. But that case does not go to the extent which the gentleman from Alabama would suggest and which we all thought it should. We have had the matter up constantly in our committee. It is a common thing in these discussions to raise that question, and we have endeavored to guard against it in this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to know if the gentleman can cite a case which overcomes the decision of the cattle case.

Mr. MANN. I think the decision in the cattle case does not affect this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If there is no decision, it seems to me clearly along the same line, that we can not delegate our legislative authority.

Mr. MANN. Clearly we could not delegate our legislative authority.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And allow this Light-House Board by the adoption of a rule to make the violation of it a criminal offense.

Mr. MANN. I do not think there is any question whatever but that we can say to a man when we give him the right to build a bridge that he shall do certain things in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Light-House Board, and that we can say if he does not follow those rules and regulations which the Light-House Board have provided it shall be a misdemeanor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree to that.

Mr. MANN. And when he accepts the provision of law giving him the right to build a bridge, I think he is estopped from raising any question about it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the gentleman that, if the regulation is made in advance, then of course it applies to that regulation. I do not agree with him, if the regulations or rules or law prescribing the crime and fixing the penalty is made after the passage of the bill; I contend that would be unconstitutional and it would be a delegation of legislative authority.

Mr. MANN. I think it is plain that if it is a lawful rule, we can punish the violation of it, and that is all we attempt to do here.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I could find out by reading the bill, but it will be quicker to ask the gentleman from Illinois. Will the gentleman tell me what rate of commutation is provided for rations?

Mr. MANN. Thirty cents a day.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The same as the Military Academy.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, this is a good bill—a meritorious measure—and ought to be passed. It is along the lines of progress and in the interest of good government. Among the most honest, efficient, and industrious men in the service of the Government are the light-house keepers of the country. They are honest and sober, brave and courageous. They do a great work. They should be well paid. I wish the bill went very much further in this regard. Their pay at present is entirely inadequate. They do not receive the recognition to which they are entitled for the long hours of their arduous labors—for the heroic work they so zealously render in season and out of season.

Now, sir, another matter in this connection of much interest to all the people of this country. We have a splendid light-house service and excellent light-houses on the Atlantic and the Gulf coasts. I am sorry I can not say as much for our Pacific coast. We must do something speedily to remedy the lack of light-houses on the Pacific. We are away behind Mexico and Canada out there, and it is very much to our discredit and to our disadvantage. The Light-House Board should wake up, and Congress should take immediate action to build more light-houses on the Pacific—especially in and about Alaska—in the north Pacific and in Bering Sea. We have too few light-houses and a most inadequate light-house service on the Pacific coast, especially in Alaska. There ought to be more light-houses in Alaska. Requests and demands come frequently from people doing business up there to the Government for additional light-houses. Why are they ignored? Some one is blundering. The Canadian government in its possessions on the north Pacific has built splendid light-houses, for which the Canadians are justly entitled to great credit. In recent years very few wrecks have occurred in the waters of the Canadian possessions on the Pacific. We have had some very bad wrecks along our north Pacific possessions, and it is due very much to the fact that in and around Alaska we have very few light-houses. We must remedy this, and the sooner we do so the better.

I am in favor of this bill, because I believe the light-house keepers and their assistants do not receive adequate compensation for the arduous duties they perform, and I want to see the committee which has this legislation in charge give us more light-houses and a better light-house service on the Pacific coast, especially in the waters of Alaska.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] were talking about these rules a few moments ago, giving some officer a right to make rules and making a disobedience of those rules a misdemeanor. Is that a correct statement of the proposition?

Mr. MANN. In a way, yes; but that is not the point.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If it is not the point, then I want to know what the point is.

Mr. MANN. We provide in the bill that a person who refuses to maintain a light on a bridge that is required by law, or shall refuse to obey any of the lawful rules and regulations relating to the same, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I was just going to make this statement: That a rule made by a Department officer within the limits of the law is perfectly valid and justifiable, and disobedience of it should be punished; but a rule made in excess of the law would be, of course, no rule at all, and punishment for disobedience of it could not be enforced.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will notice that we have corrected that in the bill. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], it includes the amendment to strike section 10 out of the bill.

Mr. MANN. That is correct. Section 10 was not read. An amendment provided for the passage of the bill with section 10 out.

Mr. ADAMSON. That eliminates the only ground of opposition that I had to the bill, because I conceived that it proposed to initiate a civil pension list. I have no objection to the bill now. I believe all of the projects carried in it are meritorious ones. I do not care to oppose any of them. We have done the best we could in the preparation of the bill, and think now that it ought to be passed as it is presented with the amendment. If any gentleman is opposed to any part of the bill I will cheerfully yield him time if he desires. Otherwise, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS] five minutes.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the House, as the House is now ready to vote on this bill. I am very heartily in favor of it and I regard it as a meritorious bill. It is the usual bill for providing aids to navigation, light-houses, and beacon lights throughout the United States, on the Atlantic coast, on the Pacific coast, and on the Gulf coast and Lakes. The amount carried by the bill is comparatively small. According to the report of the committee, for the whole country, it is about $700,000. I am very glad to see, Mr. Speaker, that the committee has incorporated in the bill, in addition to the provisions for light-houses and beacon lights throughout the United States, a provision for some slight additional compensation to light-house keepers.

I think they are a very meritorious and worthy class of men. Representing as I do in part a coast district, I have been very much interested in some increase of the salaries of this very worthy class of American citizens. Some time ago I addressed a letter to the Light-House Board asking if something could not be done toward an increase of their compensation, and I received the following reply:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR, LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, February 19, 1908.

Hon. CHAS. R. THOMAS, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry relative to the appropriation "Salaries of keepers of light-houses," the Board has the honor to state that the amount appropriated for salaries of keepers for the present fiscal year is $950,000; for the next fiscal year $1,100,000 has been asked. The increase is intended to pay keepers appointed for lights to be established and to provide for an increase in keepers' salaries.

Section 4673 of the Revised Statutes provides that light-keepers shall not exceed an average of $600 a year each. The Light-House Board in its Annual Report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1907, page 16, recommended that this average be increased from $600 to $700 a year each, in order that the salaries of all keepers might be increased, provided sufficient funds should be appropriated by Congress for the purpose.

The Board does not find that the Department has taken any action looking to a change in the above-named section 4673, and is under the impression that special legislation changing this statute will be necessary before an increase in the salaries of light-keepers can be accomplished.

Respectfully,
J. H. HELM,
Captain, United States Navy, Naval Secretary.

Following up that letter, Mr. Speaker, I introduced a bill to amend section 4673 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to provide for an increase in the average salaries of this worthy class of men from $600 per year to $700. That bill is now pending before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MANN. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I have not the number here. That bill was referred to by Captain Helm, naval secretary, and connected with the Light-House Board, in his statement made before the Committee on Appropriations, in the following language printed in the hearings:

The Board has recommended, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor has approved, that the average allowed by law be raised from $600 to $700. The Light-House Board prepared a bill to this effect by request of Representative THOMAS, and we are under the impression that he has introduced same. At any rate, the Board is anxious for a recommendation from your committee and an act of Congress providing for same.

I did introduce, Mr. Speaker, such a bill as stated by Captain Helm, providing for a slight increase of salary to light-house keepers. My bill has not been reported as yet, and I am informed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that one of the reasons why it has not been reported is the fact that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has put in this bill a provision, section 9, which gives some additional compensation to light-house keepers. Section 9 of this bill provides:

That every light-house keeper and assistant light-house keeper in the Light-House Establishment of the United States shall be entitled to receive one ration per day or, in the discretion of the Light-House Board, commutation therefor at the rate of 30 cents per ration.

That provision in the bill, Mr. Speaker, will give about $9 per month additional compensation to light-house keepers, and as the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in its judgment, has not seen fit to report my bill—I hope they will do so—I am at least glad to see that they have included this slight additional increase of compensation to light-house keepers in the pending bill. This class of men, in my judgment, living as they do, Mr. Speaker, a solitary life upon the coast in the midst of storm and of constant danger, and separated as they are from their families, in view of the increased cost of living, are justly entitled to this slight increase in compensation. I wish it could be made more. I wish my bill could be passed, increasing their average compensation from $600 to $700 a year, but if, in the wisdom of the committee and of the Congress, no more can be done than simply to give them the increase of one ration a day, I shall, with the other friends of the light-house keepers in the House of Representatives, rest content now with this slight increase. I hope in the future that something more can be done. The present sundry civil bill only carries $1,000,000 for salaries of light-house keepers, so that there is no fund provided, now, from which, if my bill was favorably reported, their salaries could be paid, and as section 9, which I have read, gives some aid to them I am very glad to see it incorporated in the pending bill, which I hope will pass without a dissenting voice.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's bill was a pretty good bill, but the increase we have proposed is more than was carried by the gentleman's bill, and while he talks about this bill being a slight increase, and he wishes we would report his bill, I will say that the smallest amount is increased $108 a year, and at the greatest, his bill only increases $100 a year, so I suspect the gentleman is fairly well satisfied.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have that statement made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this is for the benefit of the life-saving crews of the United States. They are upon the bosom of the mighty deep saving lives. Now, I would like to ask this great body when are we going to pass a bill here to help save the lives of the miners, who are constantly losing their lives in carrying on the mining of this country? I am gratified to give this increase of salary to these life-saving men—a service so necessary. They are entitled to it, and the committee has reported the bill in their favor. Now, they are all right; they have what they want; their lives are made safe and their wages increased. Now, let us aid by our vigorous and patriotic imagination, our strong arm, and our love of the fair thing the bill that the friends of the miners are trying to pass here, which will protect the heroes who delve in the bowels of the earth and lose their lives in digging up the commodity that makes us warm at our firesides, that builds up and turns the wheels of our commerce and our trade. I have heard it said here, and hence I speak this morning, that since we discussed this mining-bureau proposition here a day or two ago that perhaps the proposition covering this evil will be taken up here in a day or two. I have inquired this morning, and I hear nothing more of it, and I hope—I sincerely hope—that before another week passes over our heads we will have a bill passed in this body and sent over to the Senate, and that it will receive favorable action there. These miners we know are suffering; we know we have the constitutional power to go into the mines in our Territories, in every district, into all public lands within the jurisdiction of the United States and compel obedience to the laws of our great country. There is no just excuse for delay in this matter. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I have no other request for time. I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill as amended.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 268, nays 3, answered "present" 10, not voting 106, as follows:

YEAS—268.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 179. Joint resolution amending the joint resolution for the relief of storm sufferers in Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, and Louisiana, approved April 30, 1908.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6987. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war, and certain dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

S. 4453. An act to aid in the erection of a monument to Pocahontas at Jamestown, Va.

The message also announced that Mr. MCCUMBER, at his own request, was relieved from further service as one of the conferees on the bills H. R. 16268, making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, and S. 2420, granting an increase of pension to Margaret K. Hern, and that the Vice-President had appointed Mr. BURNHAM in his place.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 4453. An act to aid in the erection of a monument to Pocahontas at Jamestown, Va.—to the Committee on the Library.

S. 6987. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war, and certain dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

REPRINT OF REPORT.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for reprint of Report No. 1514 with views of Judiciary Committee, with permission for certain members of the committee who have not filed views to file them as a part of such reprint.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and adopt the conference report on the bill making appropriation for the Army for the ensuing fiscal year, and pending that, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the debate may be extended to one hour on a side.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. We have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request as to debate? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] moves to suspend the rules and agree to the conference report on the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to ask that the statement be read?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, before that is done——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that there be some understanding as to who shall control the time. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. If there is no understanding, recognition would be in the hands of the Chair. Does the gentleman desire to submit a request?

Mr. HAY. I demand a second, and I think that will give me control of the time.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, it is too late to demand a second now, I should imagine, on that. The second is ordered under the rules anyhow, but my idea was that I would take the floor and control one hour, and I assume that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] or the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] will take the floor and control the other hour.

Mr. HAY. As I am on the conference committee, I presume I would have control of the time.

Mr. SULZER. I ask that my colleague on the committee, who is opposed to the conference report, control the time in opposition to it.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] the other hour. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the statement.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT 1608.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 6, 7, 28, 31, 40, 41, 60, 73, 74, 77, 78, 79, 80, and 83.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 32, 33, 35, 36, 37, 38, 42, 43, 45, 46, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 57, 58, 59, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 75, 76, 82, 84, 85, and 86, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of said amendment strike out "thirty-five" and insert in lieu thereof "fifteen;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows; In line 4 of said amendment, strike out "thirty-five" and insert "twenty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 8: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed in said amendment insert the following:

"That hereafter the annual pay of officers of the Army of the several grades herein mentioned shall be as follows: Major-general, eight thousand dollars; brigadier-general, six thousand dollars; colonel, four thousand dollars; lieutenant-colonel, three thousand five hundred dollars; major, three thousand dollars; captain, two thousand four hundred dollars; first lieutenant, two thousand dollars; second lieutenant, one thousand seven hundred dollars. And the pay of cadets at the Military Academy shall hereafter be six hundred dollars a year. That hereafter the United States shall furnish mounts and horse equipments for all officers of the Army below the grade of major required to be mounted, but in case any officer below the grade of major required to be mounted provides himself with suitable mounts at his own expense, he shall receive an addition to his pay of one hundred and fifty dollars per annum if he provides one mount, and two hundred dollars per annum if he provides two mounts. Section twelve hundred and sixty-seven of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby amended to read as follows: 'In no case shall the pay of a colonel exceed five thousand dollars a year; the pay of a lieutenant-colonel exceed four thousand five hundred dollars a year, or the pay of a major exceed four thousand dollars a year:' Provided, That nothing in this section is intended to increase or change or shall be construed as increasing or changing the present pay or allowances of any officer in the United States Navy; and section thirteen of an act entitled 'An act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States,' approved March third, eighteen hundred and ninety-nine, shall not be construed as changing the pay of any naval officer by reason of the provisions of this act.

"That hereafter, immediately upon official notification of the death from wounds or disease contracted in line of duty of any officer or enlisted man on the active list of the Army, the Paymaster-General of the Army shall cause to be paid to the widow of such officer or enlisted man, or to any other person previously designated by him, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer or enlisted man at the date of his death, less seventy-five dollars in the case of an officer and thirty-five dollars in the case of an enlisted man. From the amount thus reserved the Quartermaster's Department shall be reimbursed for expenses of interment, and the residue, if any, of the amount reserved shall be paid subsequently to the designated person. The Secretary of War shall establish regulations requiring each officer and enlisted man to designate the proper person to whom this amount shall be paid in case of his death, and said amount shall be paid to that person from funds appropriated for the pay of the Army.

"That hereafter the monthly pay of enlisted men of the Army during their first enlistment shall be as follows, namely: Master electricians, master signal electricians, seventy-five dollars; engineers, sixty-five dollars; sergeants first-class Hospital Corps, fifty dollars; regimental sergeants-major, regimental quartermaster-sergeants, regimental commissary-sergeants, sergeants-major senior grade coast artillery, battalion sergeants-major of engineers, post quartermaster-sergeants, post commissary-sergeants, post ordnance-sergeants, battalion quartermaster-sergeants of engineers, electrician-sergeants first class, sergeants first class Signal Corps, and first sergeants, forty-five dollars; battalion sergeants-major of infantry and field artillery, squadron sergeants-major, sergeants-major junior grade coast artillery, battalion quartermaster-sergeants field artillery, and master gunners, forty dollars; electrician-sergeants second class, sergeants of engineers, ordnance, and Signal Corps, quartermaster-sergeants of engineers, and color-sergeants, thirty-six dollars; sergeants and quartermaster-sergeants of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, stable-sergeants, sergeants, and acting cooks of the Hospital Corps, firemen, and cooks, thirty dollars: Provided, That mess sergeants shall receive six dollars per month in addition to their pay; corporals of engineers, ordnance, Signal Corps, and Hospital Corps, chief mechanics, and mechanics, coast artillery, twenty-four dollars; corporals of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, mechanics of field artillery, blacksmiths and farriers, saddlers, wagoners, and artificers, twenty-one dollars: Provided, That not to exceed one blacksmith and farrier in each troop of cavalry and one mechanic in each battery of field artillery shall receive nine dollars per month additional for performing the duty of horseshoer; privates first class of engineers, ordnance, Signal Corps, and Hospital Corps, eighteen dollars; privates, Hospital Corps, sixteen dollars; trumpeters, musicians of infantry, artillery, and engineers, privates of cavalry, artillery, infantry, Signal Corps, and privates second class, engineers and ordnance, fifteen dollars.

"That hereafter any soldier honorably discharged at the termination of an enlistment period who reenlists within three months thereafter shall be entitled to continuous-service pay as herein provided, which shall be in addition to the initial pay provided for in this act and shall be as follows, namely: For those whose initial pay as provided herein is thirty-six dollars or more, an increase of four dollars monthly pay for and during the second enlistment, and a further increase of four dollars for and during each subsequent enlistment up to and including the seventh, after which the pay shall remain as in the seventh enlistment. For those whose initial pay as provided for herein is eighteen, twenty-one, twenty-four, or thirty dollars, an increase of three dollars monthly pay for and during the second enlistment, and a further increase of three dollars for and during each subsequent enlistment up to and including the seventh, after which the pay shall remain as in the seventh enlistment. For those whose initial pay as provided for herein is fifteen and sixteen dollars, an increase of three dollars monthly pay for and during the second and third enlistments each, and a further increase of one dollar for and during each subsequent enlistment up and to including the seventh, after which the pay shall remain as in the seventh enlistment: Provided, That hereafter any soldier honorably discharged at the termination of his first or any succeeding enlistment period who reenlists after the expiration of three months shall be regarded as in his second enlistment; that an enlistment shall not be regarded as complete until the soldier shall have made good any time lost during an enlistment period by unauthorized absences exceeding one day, but any soldier who receives an honorable discharge for the convenience of the Government after having served more than half of his enlistment shall be considered as having served an enlistment period within the meaning of this act; that the present enlistment period of men now in service shall be determined by the number of years' continuous service they have had at the date of approval of this act, under existing laws, counting three years to an enlistment, and the former service entitling an enlisted man to reenlisted pay under existing laws shall be counted as one enlistment period: And provided further, That hereafter any private soldier, musician, or trumpeter honorably discharged at the termination of his first enlistment period who reenlists within three months of the date of said discharge shall, upon such reenlistment, receive an amount equal to three months' pay at the rate he was receiving at the time of his discharge.

"That hereafter enlisted men now qualified or hereafter qualifying as marksmen shall receive two dollars per month; as sharpshooters, three dollars per month; as expert riflemen, five dollars per month; as second-class gunners, two dollars per month; as first-class gunners, three dollars per month; as gun pointers, gun commanders, observers second class, chief planters and chief loaders, seven dollars per month; as plotters, observers first class, and casemate electricians, nine dollars per month, all in addition to their pay, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, but no enlisted man shall receive at the same time additional pay for more than one of the classifications named in this section: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to increase the total number of gun pointers, gun commanders, observers, chief planters, chief loaders, plotters, and casemate electricians now authorized by law.

"That increase of pay for service beyond the limits of the States comprising the Union, and the territories of the United States contiguous thereto, shall be as now provided by law.

"That hereafter the monthly pay during the first enlistment of enlisted men of bands, exclusive of the band of the United States Military Academy, shall be as follows:

"Chief musicians, seventy-five dollars; principal musicians and chief trumpeters, forty dollars; sergeants and drum-majors, thirty-six dollars; corporals, thirty dollars; and privates, twenty-four dollars; and the continuous-service pay of all grades shall be as provided in this act: Provided, That Army bands or members thereof shall not receive remuneration for furnishing music outside the limits of military posts when the furnishing of such music places them in competition with local civilian musicians.

"That sections twelve hundred and eighty, twelve hundred and eighty-one, and twelve hundred and eighty-four of the Revised Statutes be, and are hereby, repealed, and so much of section forty-eight hundred and nineteen as pertains to the deduction of twelve and one-half cents per month from the pay of every soldier of the Regular Army for the benefit of the Soldiers' Home be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

"That section six of the act entitled "An act for the better organization of the line of the Army of the United States," approved April twenty-sixth, eighteen hundred and ninety-eight, be amended so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 6. That any soldier who deserts shall, besides incurring the penalties now attaching to the crime of desertion, forfeit all right to pension which he might otherwise have acquired.'

"That nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to reduce the pay or allowances now authorized by law for any officer or enlisted man of the Army; and all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed;"

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 34. That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 34, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed in said amendment, insert the following:

"The specific appropriations hereinbefore made for officers and enlisted men in the line of the Army and in the several staff corps and departments, enlisted men in the Hospital Corps, officers and enlisted men in the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry, and officers in the Philippine Scouts, being based upon former rates of pay, said specific appropriations are hereby increased to the amounts necessary for payment of such increase of pay at the rates established in this act: Provided, That the sum of seven million dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to provide for such increases in the said specific appropriations, and for the purpose of paying officers and enlisted men, including enlisted men of the Hospital Corps, at the rates provided for in this act;"

and change the location of the amendment so that it will precede the paragraph which it now follows, viz: The paragraph reading "All the money hereinbefore appropriated," etc.; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 39: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed in said amendment insert $300,000 (making the total for regular supplies, Quartermaster's Department, $9,300,000); and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 44: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed in said amendment insert $3,750,000; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 47: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 47, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed in said amendment insert "including the cost of packing and crating; for transportation;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 56: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed in said amendment insert $11,250,000; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 81: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 81, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out insert:

"Provided, That the trophy and medals herein authorized shall be contested for only by officers below the rank of major and by enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and the National Guard or organized militia of the several States, Territories, and of the District of Columbia."

And the Senate agree to the same.

J. A. T. HULL,
RICHARD WAYNE PARKER,
Managers on the part of the House.
F. E. WARREN,
H. C. LODGE,
JAS. P. TALIAFERRO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement was read as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and submitted in the accompanying conference report on the amendments of the Senate, namely:

Amendment No. 1 grants $25 per month in addition to regular compensation to chief clerk of division for superintendence of the War College building, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 2 provides for $5,000 for entertainment purposes at military posts in the United States, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 3 simply provides for the acceptance by the United States of a lot in the town of Fairbanks, Territory of Alaska, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 4 is for increase of post telephone systems at interior posts, and the House recedes from its disagreement and agrees to the Senate amendment striking out "thirty-five" and inserting "fifteen," leaving the amount $15,000.

Amendment No. 5 provides for the installation of post telephone systems, and the House recedes from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agrees to the same with an amendment striking out "thirty-five" and inserting "twenty," leaving the amount $20,000.

Amendment No. 6 is an increase of appropriation for officers of the line, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 7 is an increase of appropriation for the enlisted men of all grades, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 8 provides for pay and increase compensation to officers and enlisted men of the Army of all grades, and the House recedes from its disagreement and agrees to the same with an amendment fixing the pay of officers of the line from major-general to second lieutenant, at an increase of about $500 for each grade, and agrees to the pay of enlisted men by which hospital sergeants first class will receive $50 a month in place of $45, putting in stable sergeants and acting cooks of the Hospital Corps at $30 and giving horseshoers and farriers $9 per month in addition to their regular pay, and striking out the bonus for enlistment, except granting privates, musicians, and trumpeters a bonus of $3 per month for the first enlistment. Also, by adding, in the provision for expert marksmen, etc., the words, "under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe," and by the reinstatement of the section repealing sections 1280, 1281, and 1284 of the Revised Statutes and so much of section 4819 as refers to the 12½ cents per month deduction of the pay of the regular soldiers for the support of the Soldiers' Home in the District of Columbia.

Amendments Nos. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17 are made necessary if the increase in pay of the Army shall be adopted by both Houses, and the House recedes as to all of them.

Amendments Nos. 18 and 19 provide for the promotion of lower-grade clerks to higher salaries, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 20 reduces the number of clerks receiving a thousand dollars each per annum from one hundred to eighty-four, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 21 simply refers to the totals, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 22 relates to pay of officers in the Medical Department made necessary by the passage of the medical bill, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 23, additional pay for length of service, occupies the same position, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 24 is simply verbal, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 25 inserts the word "(female)" after the word "nurses," and the House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 26 and 27 are simply verbal, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 28 relates to extra pay to enlisted men as switchboard operators, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 29 increases the amount of extra pay of the enlisted men of the Signal Corps in the Territory of Alaska, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 30 increases the amount of mileage, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 31 changes the mileage provision allowing actual expenses in certain cases, and the Senate recedes.

Amendments Nos. 32 and 33 simply change the provision for increased pay to enlisted men on foreign service, making it follow the provision to increase the pay of officers in place of preceding it, and providing that it shall apply to officers serving on transports in the Philippine Archipelago, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 34 is an appropriation for $7,000,000, added on account of the increase of pay of the officers and enlisted men provided in this bill, and the House recedes from its disagreement and agrees to the same with an amendment, striking out three months' bonus for reenlistments and changing its language so as to make the appropriation specific for only $7,000,000.

Amendment No. 35 provides $1,000,000 for encampments and maneuvers for the organized militia, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 36 increases the amount for rations for the Army for the fiscal year covered by the bill, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 37 is verbal, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 38 relates to fuel and lights for enlisted men and is simply a reinstatement of present law in different language, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 39 relates to the amount appropriated for regular supplies of the Quartermaster's Department, and the House recedes from its disagreement and agrees to the amendment by striking out "nine hundred and thirty-seven thousand" and inserting "three hundred thousand," making a net increase over amount allowed by the House of $300,000.

Amendment No. 40 relates to incidental expenses for the Quartermaster's Department, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 41 is a provision for remounts, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 42 strikes out the words "relating to heavy and permanent furniture for officers' quarters," and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 43 removes suspension of accounts of the purchase of heavy furniture for two fiscal years, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 44 relates to barracks and quarters; the Senate struck out the limitation of the House bill on expenditure at any one post and increased the amount to fifteen hundred thousand dollars and added a proviso that no part of the same should be used for the construction of officers' quarters at the Army War College, and the House recedes from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agrees to the same by fixing the amount at three million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars and retaining the proviso as to construction of officers' quarters at the Army War College.

Amendment No. 45 includes heating and light for buildings erected at private cost, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 46 is verbal, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 47 relates to transportation of the Army and its supplies, and the House recedes from its disagreement and agrees to the same with an amendment retaining so much of the Senate amendment as relates to the cost of packing and crating.

Amendment No. 48 refers to transportation on land-grant railroads. Under the construction of the language of the bill as it passed the House it would not protect the rights of the Government sufficiently, and the House recedes from its disagreement and agrees to the Senate amendment, which simply states the law heretofore carried in the appropriation bills.

Amendments Nos. 49, 50, 51, and 52 are simply verbal, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 53 strikes out the total on account of a consolidation of three items by the Senate, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 54 is simply verbal, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 55 inserts the words "and other vessels," and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 56 relates to the amount appropriated for transportation, and the House recedes from its disagreement and agrees to the Senate amendment with an amendment striking out "eighty-six" and inserting "fifty."

Amendments Nos. 57, 58, and 59 are intended to make more plain what is covered by the provision, and the House recedes from its disagreement to all three amendments.

Amendment No. 60 increases the total appropriation, and the Senate recedes.

Amendments Nos. 61, 62, and 63 are verbal, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 64 inserts a provision for repairs to water and sewer systems and for hire of employees, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 65 increases the total for these purposes, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 66 enlarges the power for the purchase of additional military reservations in the Philippine Islands, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 67 increases the amount for construction and repair of hospitals and makes specific appropriation, practically as originally reported to the House by the Committee on Military Affairs, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 68 increases the amount for shooting galleries and ranges, and amendment No. 69 provides for purchasing additional land for a rifle range in order that the range at Fort Des Moines may be used this year, and the House recedes from the two amendments.

Amendment No. 70 provides for a permanent water supply for Fort William Henry Harrison, in Montana, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 71 makes a provision for the care of insane natives in the Philippine Islands serving in the Army of the United States, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 72 relates to the purchase of special apparatus and supplies for field medical equipment, strongly recommended in a supplementary estimate from the War Department, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 73 relates to the library in the Surgeon-General's Office, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 74. Senate amendment struck out the prohibition of double salaries to any employee of the Engineer School, and the Senate recedes, leaving the language in the bill.

Amendment No. 75 is verbal, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 76 authorizes the issue of old ammunition for target practice to certain institutions. It was originally reported to the House by the House Committee on Military Affairs, struck out on a point of order, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 77 provides for machine and automatic guns, including carriages, etc., to the organized militia, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 78 increases the amount appropriated for field artillery for the organized militia, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 79 is for the purchase, manufacture, and test of machine and automatic guns, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 80 is an increase for the amount of manufacture of arms, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 81 is a limitation on those competing for trophies and medals at national shoots. The Senate struck out all the limitation. The House recedes from its disagreement and agrees to the same, with an amendment limiting the competition to officers below the grade of major.

Amendment No. 82 simply provides that the Federal Government may, in time of war, call in all equipment issued to seacoast State artillery organizations.

Amendment No. 83 provides for sale of arms to heads of Executive Departments and Members of Congress, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 84 authorizes the Chief of Ordnance to purchase articles of such nature that the interest of the public service would be injured by publicly divulging them, in such manner as he may deem most economical and efficient, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 85 provides for the construction of an iron fence about the monument erected on the Big Hole battlefield, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 86 provides for the construction at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., of necessary quarters for officers and army nurses, and the House recedes.

J. A. T. HULL,
RICHARD WAYNE PARKER,
JAMES HAY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the bill as it passed the Senate carried appropriations of $98,840,469.12; as agreed to by the conference committee, there will be dropped from the amount of increase by the Senate $3,463,162.51. There was restored in conference, on account of library in the Surgeon-General's office, the sum of $5,000, making the bill carry, as submitted by the two Houses, $95,382,240.61, if the conference report shall be adopted.

The main point of disagreement, as I apprehend, will cover but two items in the bill. The House passed an amendment giving an increase of pay to all the enlisted force in the Army. It made a very large increase in the pay of the noncommissioned force of the Army and a reasonable increase for the privates, but provided for an increased pay for each enlistment. The Senate practically adopted the provision of the House amendment, so far as it relates to the enlisted force. They changed it in very few particulars, one office only being substantially increased, that which we always called "hospital steward," but, as it is now called, "hospital sergeant of the first class."

During my service in the Volunteer Army we had no hospital sergeants; they were all hospital stewards, and I am sorry they changed the name. In the bill we passed we gave them $45; under the Senate amendment their pay was increased to $50 a month. That is the only change in the increases except for farriers and blacksmiths, when they perform the duty of farriers or blacksmiths, in addition to their pay of the rank as sergeant the Senate amendment gives them $9 per month for such service.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. How many officers are there whose pay is increased, and what is the amount of the increase of pay?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There are about 16,000 noncommissioned officers.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. How much increase does that make?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. For the enlisted force the increase will be about $5,000,000.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Over and above what it is now?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Over and above what it is now.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. About $4,000,000?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. More than that.

The Senate added to this amendment of ours—and you will find it as amendment No. 8 in the bill as printed with the Senate amendments—by an increase of pay of all the officers of the Army. They had their proposition on a percentage increase, starting with the Lieutenant-General, granting him 5 per cent, major-generals and brigadier-generals 10 per cent, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and majors 15 per cent, captains and lieutenants, as I remember now, 25 per cent. The House conferees were opposed to any percentage increase. It meant an increase, even with a smaller per cent, of a much larger sum to the higher officer than it did for the lower officer, while we believed the highest officers were fairly well paid now and the lower officers absolutely inadequately paid. So that in conference we agreed to eliminate the Lieutenant-General, and give no increase on that grade. In fact the grade expires with the expiration of the active service of the officer now holding that commission. Major-generals are now getting $7,500 a year, and we make their flat pay $8,000 a year. The brigadier-general gets $5,500 a year and we make his flat pay $6,000 a year. There is no increase pay for length of service of general officers; but there is an allowance to general officers that increases their pay. I want to be entirely frank with the House.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does the bill increase the allowance, also?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not at all. The allowance of a major-general of the Army or a rear-admiral of the Navy is $108 per month for rent. They only get that in the event of the Government not furnishing quarters. It is largely expended in the cities where there are headquarters, such as at Washington, Chicago, San Francisco, and New York. I think every gentleman here familiar with the conditions of the city will realize that the officers would be better off if the Government would furnish them quarters than the officers are with the commutation of quarters; in other words, that they pay more for rent than the Government pays them in lieu of the house the Government should furnish.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think when the Government has paid the officers $108 that they should pay for rooms for them to live in?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The Government gives them rooms, or pays for so many rooms. It is graded by rank.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many rooms do they get?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. A major-general is allowed nine rooms for himself and family.

Mr. TAWNEY. Which would aggregate $1,296 a year.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly. It only goes to the man that is not furnished quarters. The Government contracts with every officer either to furnish quarters or commutation for them while he remains in service. I can say to the gentleman that I have in mind one officer he probably knows, General Humphrey, who, when quartermaster-general, refused to accept commutation, and traveled to Fort Myer and returned each day because he could not hire a suitable house for the amount that the Government furnished, and preferred to take Government quarters to receiving the commutation.

A brigadier-general or a rear-admiral of the second class gets $96 a month for commutation. Colonels in the Army or captains in the Navy get $84 a month. Lieutenant-colonels in the Army or commanders in the Navy get $72 a month. Majors of the Army and lieutenant-commanders of the Navy get $60 a month; captains in the Army or lieutenants in the Navy $48 a month; first lieutenants in the Army or lieutenants of the junior grade in the Navy (the second grade I am reading all the time refers to the Navy, I will say, corresponding to the grade in the Army) get $36 a month; second lieutenants in the Army or ensigns in the Navy get $24 a month, and officers of any rank occupying one room as quarters get $12 a month.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Do they get this commutation while they occupy Government quarters?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, no; not at all; not a penny. They only get it where the Government does not furnish the quarters.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much of this money goes to the retired officers—how much of this increase?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. None of this. Retired officers get no allowances.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do we increase their pay?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will come to that in a minute.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You have not reached that yet?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman state how much the additional allowances aggregate in addition to the quarters?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There are no additional allowances.

Mr. TAWNEY. Light, heat, and fuel, $576 a year, to a major-general.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There is no commutation in that. They get nothing unless they use the fuel. A man in Florida who does not need the fuel gets no money for not using it. A man in Alaska that has to use it simply gets fuel to keep him warm. I think every gentleman will see the fairness of that. If you did not have a uniform allowance, the officer in Alaska could hardly live on his salary and buy fuel to keep him warm, while a man in Porto Rico or the Hawaiian Islands or Cuba would not need it at all for that, and if he drew it would get it as profit. He gets not one penny of commutation of fuel and light. He only gets the fuel and light where he uses them.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow one question for information?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understood the gentleman to say just now what was the compensation, for instance, of a first lieutenant or captain.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. A captain is allowed four rooms at $12 a month each.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What pay does he get?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It depends upon the branch of the service he is in.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Suppose he is in the Army? What I want to get at is this: What does the Government require that officer, captain or lieutenant, to pay out to supply himself with clothing annually?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think a captain's uniform costs about $1,100. I do not suppose he has to buy it every year, but his outfit costs $1,100, and he must keep it up to date all the time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. He must keep it up out of his salary, if he has no other source of income?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. He gets it out of his salary, unless he marries a rich girl or has private means.

Now, I want to come to the retired officers for one minute. There is a flat increase in this provision of about $500 to the grades from major-general down to second lieutenant, with the exception that under this conference report a captain will get $2,400 a year, while a captain of infantry to-day gets $1,800 a year and a captain of cavalry or a captain of artillery gets $2,000. In the increase which we have made we have equalized that, giving the one $400 and the other $600. Then we provide that where the Government furnishes the mount for a mounted officer he shall have no additional compensation for that; but where he furnishes his own horse and equipment, he gets $150 a year extra for one horse or $200 a year where he keeps two horses, and it is limited to that, so that it equalizes the pay. As it is to-day the Government furnishes all the mounts for everybody who goes to the Philippine Islands. The Government furnishes mounts for all the light artillery, and in many cases in this country to the different branches of the service required to be mounted, and the men are paid extra besides. Your committee felt that that was absolutely wrong, and cut it off, except where a man provides his own mount, and that is limited to officers below the grade of major. Majors, lieutenant-colonels, colonels, and generals are now required to be mounted, and the Government pays them nothing extra for their mounts. The flat pay covers the mount as well.

Mr. BUTLER. That is, no increase is provided by this bill for the mount?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No, sir; not for officers above the rank of captain.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman has stated what is the pay of officers, and also the commutation for quarters. What is the amount of the longevity pay which officers receive in addition to these things?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Forty per cent of their pay for twenty years' service; but we have limited that in the case of colonels, so that it can not exceed $5,000 a year. The law now gives a colonel $4,500 as a limit. We have limited it in the case of lieutenant-colonels so that it can not exceed $4,500 a year. It is now limited to $4,000. In the case of a major we have limited it to $4,000, and it is now limited to $3,500. So that longevity and all never increases a man beyond the $500 more than what he is getting to-day. So you will see that it is safely guarded.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman undertook to state something about the pay of retired officers, and then he diverted to active officers going to the Philippines, and backward and forward. I should like to get at the lump sum you are paying retired officers that are doing nothing. The retired officer is practically out of the Army, practically a civilian, and it seems you are increasing his pay.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We are.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Can you give it to us in a lump sum and then give it to us in detail?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. You will have to figure it up on the number of officers. I have not the lump sum. We have the lump sum of the pay as it is to-day, and I can give the gentleman the number of officers on the retired list.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman make a statement justifying the proposed increase of $17,000,000 in the cost of maintaining the Army next year over this, without adding a single man to the service?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think I can. I will do my best to satisfy my friend from New York, and if I can only succeed in doing that I know that I shall have accomplished a great deal.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would be glad to hear a statement that would satisfy me on that.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Approximately, what is the increase per annum in the pay of retired officers?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I would say the approximate increase in the pay of retired officers would be about $200,000 a year, or a fraction over that, certainly not over $225,000.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What particular reason is there for increasing the pay of retired officers, who are rendering no service to the Government?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. This bill does not deal with the retired officers at all; there is a law now on our statute books which provides that every officer retired shall receive three-quarters of the pay of his grade on the active list. For instance, if a major is retired he gets three-quarters of the pay of a major serving on the active list, without any allowances. So by increasing the pay of a major on the active list we increase the pay of a major on the retired list, because he will receive three-fourths of the pay of a major on the active list.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. That is the effect of this legislation?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Absolutely.

Mr. OLMSTED. When a man goes into the Army, under the act of 1861, does he not go in under a contract that if he spends forty years in the service he will be retired on three-quarters of the amount of pay he would get if he was on the active list?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; but we could abrogate that if we wanted to by law.

Mr. OLMSTED. That would be hardly honorable, would it?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There is this trouble about it: Of course a man on the retired list gets no allowance and gets nothing but his three-quarters flat pay. To make up for that he can live where he pleases, in any style he pleases, although to a certain extent he can never forget the fact that he does represent the Government.

Mr. OLMSTED. The cost of living is increased just as much for an officer on the retired list as on the active list?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Possibly. Now, it has been contended that if those on the retired list should not have any benefit of this bill and the pay should not be increased, then the men that were to be retired to-morrow—this is their argument—would have one class of pay, and another officer living right beside him would have another class of pay. Of course there is some weight to that, but it is not conclusive.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not true that they have an executed contract and that a man that is retired is retired under that contract?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; the Secretary of War took that ground. I am not arguing that point, but I do want to call attention of the House to this point that seems to me will appeal with force to any man who has had any experience in it. The very minute you undertake this discrimination—and that is what they would call it—life would not be worth living to any Member of Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. Except in the skies.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Well, I do not want to go to the skies just now. The total number of officers on the retired list to-day is 942.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let me ask the gentleman: An officer on the retired list is liable to be called into active service of the Government at any time?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is the theory, but practically, no. They are allowed to do certain work and they get the whole pay of their rank while discharging those duties. It is a very remote contingency that officers on the retired list will be called upon for active service.

Now, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that a great deal of objection is made to the increase because there are 268 retired brigadier-generals on the list. That looks like a tremendous number. But, gentlemen, remember this fact, that every one of them, almost without a single exception, are retired because of civil-war service; nearly every one of them. They have been ground through Congress and through the Executive Mansion, confirmed by the Senate at a rate that is now impossible to keep up. Since the 1st day of January nine of these brigadier-generals have passed beyond. Almost without exception every man on that retired list above the grade of major had civil-war service, and every man that had civil-war service has passed beyond the meridian of his life and has but a few years left him.

Mr. TAWNEY. What rate of pension do they receive?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They receive no pension, only three-quarters of the pay of their rank. Three-quarters of $5,500 is all that any brigadier on the list receives. After a man has served his country and retired for old age—and many of them bear the wounds received in battle in saving the Union—I would not care if it was increased beyond what we have increased it, and I would not vote to take one dollar away from them.

Now, as to the criticism of the number of brigadier-generals. The fact that nine have died since the 1st of January makes it almost a certainty that in less than five years the list will be reduced over three-quarters, and so I am not alarmed about that.

Mr. DRISCOLL. How much of a pension does the widow of a brigadier-general get?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Thirty dollars a month if he dies as a result of wounds received in the service. Nothing if he does not.

Mr. CONNER. Is it a fact that the brigadier-generals get no pension?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The general gets no pension and the widow none unless the husband dies as a result of wounds received in the service or disease contracted in service. I know a widow of a brigadier-general here in town whose husband died of old age, and she does not get a cent of pension. They can get nothing unless it is by special act of Congress.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean to say that the widow of a brigadier-general has no pension?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not at all, unless her husband died as the result of service.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And the gentleman knows that the trouble must have originated in the service?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It had to originate in the service, or he would not die as a result of the service. In a volunteer officer, it has to originate in the service in time of war. You eliminate the civil-war men from your retired list, and you have not more than 265 on the retired list who did not have civil-war service, and they are all below the grade of major.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman please repeat that statement?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think there are but 265 that have no civil-war record that are on the retired list.

Mr. BUTLER. Of all grades?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Below the grade of major?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes. I know men that are retired as lieutenants and captains on the retired list that have a civil-war record, but I am not counting them in so as to offset anybody that might be above that grade who did not have a civil-war record.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is the mortality of those retired men that had service in the civil war?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I have given you one grade of brigadier-general. They are dying off so fast that in a very little while there will be a very few of them left. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] calls my attention here in the Army and Navy Register to one page on which there are eight, and the youngest of those is 83 years old. I am not finding fault with the fact that we give any increase to the major or brigadier generals. There are seven major-generals, and there will be only six when General Ainsworth retires. There are seven now on the active list, and at $500 apiece that is $3,500 a year. There are twenty-seven brigadiers, fifteen of the line only, and with $500 apiece a year it is a mere bagatelle.

I did not feel that I was justified in tying up a great appropriation bill here indefinitely simply to try to save less than $15,000 a year in this way. It is true these men have extra expense. It is true they are not as hard up as men of the line. But what I wanted above everything was to increase the pay of the field and line officers. I will volunteer this proposition: That there is not a man in the Army to-day of the rank of major or below the grade of major who, if he has not private means of his own or if he has not married a rich wife, is not in debt. And they are compelled to be in debt by the exigencies of the service. They ought all to be compelled to marry rich wives—but that would be foreign to our theory of marriage.

Mr. COCKRAN. We should make them competitors with foreign dukes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes. We increase the pay of the cadets at the two academies $100 a year each. Their flat pay now at each academy is $500. Congress some few years ago equalized the Military Academy with that of the Naval by granting one ration a day or a commutation at 30 cents, making the pay of each of the academies for each cadet $609 a year. We gave them in this agreement $100 increase on that, making it $709 a year, in place of $609.

Mr. TIRRELL. Are the parents or guardians of these cadets or midshipmen allowed to furnish them any money while they are there?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They are not. Of course, when they graduate the man whose parents are well to do can help him all they want to so far as his uniform is concerned, but the man who has not anything, or whose parents have nothing, has to save that from his pay, or go in debt for his uniform. The theory of both of these academies, I think, is a splendid one for our country—that all cadets must be on an exact equality, while cadets, at least, and no cadet is allowed to have money to expend from the private funds of his parents or from his own private funds, but must live in the same way that every other cadet does. In other words, the son of a washerwoman and the son of a millionaire stand upon the same equality, and I want it to always be that way, and so do you, gentlemen. [Applause.]

There is another feature of this amendment No. 8 that I desire to call attention to, that we have agreed to, and that is that the widow or next of kin of an officer who dies from wounds received in battle or disease contracted in active service gets six months' pay of his rank, and the widow or next of kin of a private soldier will get six months' pay of his rank. It is a new proposition. It will cost the Government probably money in time of war. In time of peace it will cost very little, because the man has to die in active service as a result of the service either from wounds or disease. We now take charge of the burial under a construction of the law in the appropriations for the Quartermaster's Department, a construction only. This makes it positive that the Government will give the widow six months' pay of the rank her husband held, retaining for an officer $75 for immediate funeral expenses and for a private soldier $35 for immediate funeral expenses.

Mr. DAWSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DAWSON. Will that in any way change the pensionable status of that widow?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not a bit; not a bit.

Mr. KAHN. That simply carries it for the Army practically what is done now in the case of a United States minister or consul abroad, or Member of the House.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes. We now give to the widow of every Member of Congress who dies a year's salary; I think I am not wrong in that, and to every employee of the House six months' pay.

Mr. KAHN. That is very true.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It simply extends to the Army, and will to the Navy and Marine Corps, this recognition, that when a man is called away and his family may be left dependent and need something at once, to care for them.

Mr. PADGETT. Might I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, certainly.

Mr. PADGETT. I notice in the amendment to which the gentleman is speaking it says:

> Shall cause to be paid to the widow of such officer or enlisted man or to any other person previously designated by him.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; previously designated——

Mr. PADGETT. And the question I wish to put is, Suppose he has no next of kin at all? Can he designate an entire stranger and the Government give to that stranger six months' pay? Ought not it to be limited to the widow and next of kin; or, if he wants, let him designate some one as a recipient for the benefit of the widow or next of kin?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think anyone he designated could receive it.

Mr. PADGETT. This will allow him to give six months' pay to an entire stranger, would it not?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Well, if you go on the theory that you may find a man who has neither relatives nor family, yes; but it is a very remote possibility that any man would not have some relative, widow, or next of kin.

Mr. PADGETT. Suppose he has a widow and children and he designates that an entire stranger is to receive the benefit of this six months' pay?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That he can not do.

Mr. PADGETT. It does not say so here.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is to go to the widow and children first, and it is to be under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. PADGETT. It says here "to the widow of such officer or enlisted man, or to any other person previously designated by him."

Mr. HULL of Iowa. But it says later on, "The Secretary of War shall establish regulations requiring each officer and enlisted man to designate the proper person."

Mr. PADGETT. Suppose he designates not the widow and the children, but an entire stranger.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not believe that would be a proper person at all, and I do not believe——

Mr. PADGETT. It does not say so here. It says it shall go to any person designated by him.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; it says the Secretary of War shall make regulations for the designation of a proper person.

Mr. PADGETT. It says, "The Secretary of War shall establish regulations requiring each officer and enlisted man to designate the proper person to whom this amount shall be paid in case of his death, and said amount shall be paid to that person from funds appropriated for the pay of the Army." Now, it does not say he shall designate some one for the benefit of the widow or children or next of kin, and the objection I have to the qualification is not that the widow would get it or the next of kin or the children, but he might designate an entire stranger to pay some debt.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, of course——

Mr. PADGETT. Is it possible to amend it?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. You can not amend it; you will have to take it as it is or reject it.

Mr. KEIFER. I think the suggestion is a good one.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. If such a construction could be held——

Mr. PADGETT. It is the language in the bill, and I am willing for the widow and children to have it, but I do not think it is proper for an entire stranger to have it.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is a mere construction, something I think will never happen. It can not be amended now.

Mr. PADGETT. It is not only a mere construction, but it is the express language, and it says it shall be paid to anyone whom he designates.

Mr. KAHN. Is not it a fact that when a man enlists either in the Army or in the Navy he designates his parents or somebody next of kin, so in case of an accident to him the Department knows with whom to communicate? Is not that the fact?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I have very little time, but the point I want to bring out is that the only way to change this is to vote down the conference report. I do not know it would be changed in conference. It can not be amended, and I want to say right here that if there is any danger of such a state of affairs happening as that to which the gentleman refers that Congress meets next December and the House will be unanimous in placing such a limitation on it, so that no evil can come from it between now and next December, and no harm can come to the Government by this action.

Now, I want to reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker, because it may be necessary for others to speak and for me to say something more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CAPRON in the chair). The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] reserves the balance of his time.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I have always admired the skill and ingenuity with which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] manages the Army bill on this floor, and I have been very much struck with the skill with which he has diverted the attention of the House from the question which we ought to consider and has undertaken to appeal to their patriotism about civil war veterans, whose increase of pay is really a very small portion of the money appropriated in the bill.

Now, the Army bill of the current year carries $78,000,000. This bill under consideration carries $95,000,000, an increase of $17,000,000. Of that increase $7,000,000 is proposed for the increase of pay, $2,000,000 being set aside for the increase of the pay of the officers, and $5,000,000 for the increase of the pay of enlisted men. A calculation of the number of officers on the active list of the Army will show that it will take $2,071,000 to pay them; so that that is not enough to pay the officers of the Army. It would take $50,000 more to pay the increase to cadets. It will take something over $500,000 to pay the increase of the officers on the retired list. So that the bill does not provide money enough for the increase of pay carried in the bill. Therefore, when you say that $7,000,000 is carried for the increase of pay, you do not tell exactly what the increase of pay will be.

The $5,000,000 set apart for the increase of pay of enlisted men will not, in my judgment, do it—certainly not after the first year. So that a fair statement of the case will show that this increase of pay will carry not less, after the first year, than $6,000,000. Now, apart from the increase of pay, this bill increases the expenses of the Army $10,000,000 more than last year, while there has not been added to the Army a single man; while, so far as I am informed, there has not been added to the expenses of the military establishment anything more than they had last year. And why this increase of $10,000,000? The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] said he was going to explain it to the gentleman from New York, but I observed that he did not make any explanation of that increase. Now, as to this increase of pay, I want to say that in five years, when it comes into operation, the Government will have to appropriate every year not less than $25,000,000 as a result of this increase of pay, as much as the Army was costing at the beginning of the Spanish war.

So, you see, we are embarking upon a very considerable expenditure of the public money, and we are not sure that that will be the end of it.

Now, I want to call attention to the fact that we have been increasing the pay of the officers of the Army almost every year. It was only year before last that we increased their commutation for quarters; it was only year before last that we gave them fuel and light in addition to their pay, and we have been adding one thing and another until the mere flat pay which you hear about is not the actual pay which an Army officer gets. This bill carries about $1,000,000 for heavy furniture for the officers of the Army—$949,000, I think, is the exact figure.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will not the gentleman in that connection, because I know he wants to be as fair in the House as I do myself, state that the furniture belongs to the Government and is expected to save its cost to the Government in transportation?

Mr. HAY. Of course it belongs to the Government, and the officer gets the benefit.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The Government saves, however, the transportation as an offset for the purchase.

Mr. HAY. It saves some transportation, but it is an increase of the officer's emoluments, and it is an allowance that they have never had before, and while something may be saved in transportation, yet I am talking about what the officer gets.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The officer does not get it.

Mr. HAY. Well, he uses it.

Mr. COCKRAN. Would the gentleman allow me to ask him a question just for the information of the House? To what extent is the officer compelled now to supply his own furniture? To what extent does the Government furnish it?

Mr. HAY. Now he is compelled to furnish all of his furniture.

Mr. COCKRAN. Out of his pay?

Mr. HAY. Out of his pay. Now the Government proposes to put in all necessary furniture of the kind that we call heavy furniture, which includes tables, sideboards, and chairs, and all the beds, and so forth.

Mr. COCKRAN. Does it include chairs?

Mr. HAY. I think so; yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No.

Mr. COCKRAN. It would be difficult to understand what it would be like if——

Mr. HAY. I understand that chairs were in the list published by the War Department.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not understand that the chairs are included—only the large furniture.

Mr. HAY. Well, I will give up the chairs, then.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You do not expect them to stand all the time.

Mr. LANDIS. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. LANDIS. Has the gentleman ever moved himself?

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes; "the gentleman" has moved.

Mr. LANDIS. Does not the gentleman know that, coupled with the proposition of moving furniture and other household effects, as a general rule, the loss is from 25 to 50 per cent?

Mr. HAY. That is true; but heretofore the Government has been paying for the moving and not the officers.

Mr. LANDIS. But the wear and tear is great, and the gentleman knows the adage that "three moves is equal to a fire."

Mr. HAY. That is true; but I do not see how that affects the proposition of giving the furniture which the officer will find in his quarters when he gets there.

Mr. LANDIS. I would say, coupled with these frequent removals and the fact that we recognize that the salary is not extravagant, that it would be curtailing the pay of these officers if we did not stand some part of the expenses.

Mr. HAY. That is a matter of opinion. As I was going on to say, for instance, a captain of cavalry gets a flat pay of $2,000. Now, quite many captains in the Army have served twenty years; and you must remember that every Army officer's pay, including the colonel, gets longevity or "fogey" pay. When he has served five years he gets 10 per cent additional; when he has served ten years he gets 20 per cent additional; when he has served fifteen years he gets 30 per cent added, and when he has served twenty years he gets 40 per cent added. So that a captain of cavalry, instead of getting $2,000 only, when he has served twenty years gets $2,800. In addition to that he gets his fuel and lights and other benefits. He gets his furniture; he gets his quarters given him when he is at a post or commutation of quarters when not stationed in any Army post. Now, all these things added up make not less than $3,200 or $3,300 a year; so that it seems to me, in the present condition of the Treasury and the expenses in which we are placed, it is not the proper time to increase the pay of these Army officers.

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he does not know that a man who has the ability to serve as an officer in the United States Army, if he were employed by any corporation of any size in this country, would receive a greater compensation as an increase than would be ten times the cost of this little bit of furniture?

Mr. HAY. Well, I do not know about that.

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. I do; and I know that that is the case.

Mr. HAY. I decline to yield further.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I had in my mind the furniture proposition when the gentleman was interrupted. Now, does the gentleman think it is altogether fair to charge up as part of the officer's salary, or-so-called "emoluments." the furniture that is bought by the Government, which is owned by the Government, not by the officer at all, except, for the time being, that he uses it for the purpose of the Government? Is it exactly fair to charge that up to the officer's salary?

Mr. HAY. I do not say so. I say it is part of the perquisites pertaining to the office, just as this furniture at the Office Building is part of your perquisites and mine——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Not at all.

Mr. HAY (continuing). And which we would have to pay for or pay for its use.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I paid for mine for the past ten years and my office, too, in which I did the public's work.

Mr. HAY. So did I.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We ought to have been furnished offices twelve years ago.

Mr. HAY. That may be so; but still we get it, and I am relieved and you are relieved to just that extent.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes, that is true; but I do not think that ought to be charged up to me.

Mr. HAY. Oh, well, you know it will be charged.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is a Government investment for official purposes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question or two?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I appreciate what the gentleman says about furniture, and that while it does not belong to the officer, still he gets the benefit of it in its continuous use. But I would like to ask the gentleman, he having made a study of the Army and Navy officers, perhaps, and I am somewhat interested myself, if he thinks that the officers, especially the line officers, are now receiving adequate compensation?

Mr. HAY. I do.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. You stated, furthermore, that you did not think, owing to the condition of the Treasury, that this was the proper time to raise the salaries. Is that the substance of it?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Has there been heretofore, in the opinion of the gentleman, any time that he thought was a better time to raise these salaries than at the present, when prices of living are high?

Mr. HAY. Yes; I think when the country was prosperous and the Treasury was overflowing and the revenues of the Government were very much larger than they are now, that would have been a very much better time.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman think there is any prospect of any better time coming in the future to raise these salaries than now?

Mr. HAY. I hope so. If the Democratic party can get control of the Government, I hope they will bring better times. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I appreciate the gentleman's fond but delusive hope, yet I simply wanted to know what the gentleman thought about the increase of these salaries—whether the time had gone by when we ought to have raised them, or whether there will be a better time in the future than the present to do so.

Mr. HAY. I think a better time may come, when it might be done. I want to say to the gentleman that I have the very highest regard for the officers of the Army. I have personal relations with a great many of them, and it is not a pleasant task for me to antagonize this legislation.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman not know, if he has personal relations with a good many Army officers, that a majority of them can hardly meet their legitimate expenses at the present time.

Mr. HAY. No; I do not know that. I know that some of them say they can not do it, and some of them do it. I suppose it depends largely upon the individual.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. But as to the majority of them, do they not have a hard time to pay expenses under present conditions?

Mr. HAY. I do not know that. It depends upon what their expenses are, and what they make their expenses.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact that one of the chief hardships of military officers, and one of the causes that makes it difficult for them to make both ends meet, is the constant moving from post to post, incurring traveling and moving expenses, and is there any justification for that?

Mr. HAY. I imagine that with the small Army we have it is necessary to move the Army and the different commands in it very frequently. Otherwise you would keep some men in the Philippines, for instance, for years and keep other men here for years. You have got to shift them about. Part of the Army is in Cuba, part in the Philippines, and part in Alaska, and one command ought not to be kept in the Philippines, for instance, all the time. They must be shifted about. I do not see how you are going to obviate that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not deny that some change is necessary, but it seems to me preposterous that officers should be bankrupted and the Government put to heavy expense by shifting them every six months, or a year or two years, from one place to another.

Mr. HAY. Well, the Government is put to a heavy expense. The officer himself is not put to any personal expense, because he gets 7 cents a mile when he travels on duty. Of course if he moves his family, that is an expense; but his personal travel expense is provided for by the Government.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Government is taxed heavily, and many of these officers are almost bankrupted by this constant moving, and I have never been able to find any justification for it.

Mr. HAY. I do not see how the officer can be bankrupted, because the Government not only pays him mileage, but it also pays for the transportation of his baggage.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Many of these officers have families.

Mr. HAY. Oh, well; that is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And many of them have furniture.

Mr. HAY. That is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And, as the gentleman from Indiana said, three moves are equivalent to the total destruction of the furniture.

Mr. HAY. We are providing for that, so that they will not be compelled to move the furniture. They will have furniture provided for them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that is wise.

Mr. COCKRAN. I do not know that I have understood the gentleman's position correctly. Does he claim that officers of the Army are sufficiently paid now, or does he claim that the pay is inadequate but the condition of the Treasury such as to make it unwise at this time to give them adequate compensation?

Mr. HAY. I think that certainly all officers above the rank of captain are now adequately paid.

Mr. COCKRAN. Does the gentleman include captains in that?

Mr. HAY. I said above the rank of captain.

Mr. COCKRAN. Then the gentleman admits that captains and those below that grade are inadequately paid?

Mr. HAY. It is possible that there should be additions to the pay of second and first lieutenants and captains, but I do not think this is a good time to do it.

Mr. COCKRAN. I understand the gentleman's position is that this additional compensation should be made, but that it would be too expensive to do it now?

Mr. HAY. Well, no; the gentleman did not understand me to say that.

Mr. COCKRAN. I should like to know the gentleman's position.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman understands me to say that I consider the pay of officers above the rank of captain to be adequate.

Mr. COCKRAN. I understand that. How about the others?

Mr. HAY. It may be that the other officers should be paid more. I am not prepared to say that they should be. For instance, take a second lieutenant. He gets $1,400 a year now. He comes out of West Point and he is credited with four years' service, and at the end of one year's service he has 10 per cent added to his pay, which makes $1,540, besides other perquisites. It does seem to me that a young man who has just come out of college, educated at the expense of the Government, who has been given everything that can be given to a young man in the way of advantages of every sort, that after being out one year in the world receives $1,540 a year, together with other perquisites, that for the time being that is an adequate compensation. I do not know of any other case of any man in the world who has equal advantages.

Mr. COCKRAN. Does the gentleman know what a bookkeeper is paid in New York City?

Mr. HAY. How old is the bookkeeper?

Mr. COCKRAN. Twenty-one or 22; and what does the gentleman suppose he gets; would he think that such a man was overpaid at $1,500 a year?

Mr. HAY. I do not know what pay he gets, but I know that it does not cost an Army officer as much to live where he does live as it would in New York.

Mr. COCKRAN. Does the gentleman think there is any comparison in the preparation of each man for his work?

Mr. HAY. I do not; and I think a man educated by the Government is much better qualified.

Mr. COCKRAN. But do I understand the gentleman from Virginia to say that because a second lieutenant is peculiarly qualified for work of an exceptional value, that he should be paid less?

Mr. HAY. I do not say anything of that sort. The gentleman from New York can not put words into my mouth.

Mr. COCKRAN. I beg to assure the gentleman that I do not wish to put words into his mouth; I want to get the view of the gentleman.

Mr. HAY. I do not presume the gentleman from New York cares very much what my views are.

Mr. COCKRAN. I do care very much, indeed; the gentleman does himself faint justice.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman from New York wants to muddy the water. I have stated repeatedly what my views were.

Mr. COCKRAN. If the gentleman will allow me to remind him, a few moments ago he stated that all the officers under the rank of major were underpaid.

Mr. HAY. I did not say anything of the sort, and the gentleman can not put words into my mouth. I decline to yield further.

Now, I want to call attention to what the Army is costing or will cost in the event of the adoption of this conference report. This bill, as I said, carries $95,000,000. The fortification bill carries $10,000,000. The sundry civil bill carries $4,000,000 for purely Army purposes, and the permanent appropriation for the Army which is made every year is $4,000,000 more, which makes $113,000,000 that the Army will cost the country after the passage of this bill.

Now, if gentlemen think that we are justified in voting for the bill, adding this burden to the country, of course it is their lookout. I have endeavored, as best I could, to show the conditions about this increase of pay and about other increases. and I believe that the House should vote down the conference report.

Mr. DAWSON. Can the gentleman tell the House what the lump sum would be both in the active and retired list for the two highest grades in the Army, brigadier-general and major-general?

Mr. HAY. The increase on the active list of a major-general is $500.

Mr. DAWSON. I mean the lump sum, showing how much the total would be.

Mr. HAY. I can not give you that, for I have not the figures. I can give you the increase on the retired list of a major-general, which is $375; and there are twenty-five major-generals, which would be an increase of $9,375. The increase of a brigadier-general is $375 a year, and the increase would be $99,750 for all of them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think it would be more just to increase the pay of the retired Army officer than to increase the pay of those on the active list?

Mr. HAY. No; I do not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We are doing both in this bill.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If we could not do both, which does the gentleman think would do more justice to the Treasury?

Mr. HAY. I think the men on the active list should be increased before those on the retired list, undoubtedly.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman please tell us just how much the increase is on the rank beginning with the second lieutenant and ending with major?

Mr. HAY. It is $500.

Mr. GOULDEN. All the way through?

Mr. HAY. All the way through.

Mr. GOULDEN. Including the second lieutenant?

Mr. HAY. No; I think it is $300 to the second lieutenant.

Mr. GOULDEN. How much to a cadet at West Point?

Mr. HAY. One hundred dollars.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the lump sum for these grades, beginning with the cadet and ending with the rank of major, how much is required to raise their salaries as proposed?

Mr. HAY. It will require, I suppose, a little under a million dollars.

Mr. GOULDEN. I think the gentleman is in favor, perhaps, of that increase?

Mr. HAY. Not at this time.

Mr. GOULDEN. I am, most heartily.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia has been a very active member of the Committee on Military Affairs and is of course familiar with all these matters. I would ask the gentleman whether he has received any light in the committee from the hearings or in any other place as to why the increase is at this time demanded or requested?

Mr. HAY. Well, this is not the first time that it has been demanded or requested. The increase has been demanded and requested repeatedly for years back. It has just now culminated.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is it not a fact that in almost every one of the Congressional districts the requests for appointments for cadets are very much in excess of the number that can be filled?

Mr. HAY. Unquestionably.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. And all are willing to go in at the present rate?

Mr. HAY. Undoubtedly. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this conference report is fair and just and ought to be adopted. As a member of the Committee on Military Affairs I shall vote for it. We have a very small Army, and I am in favor of making it just as practicable and just as efficient as possible. We all know that within recent times there have been a great many desertions from the Army, because the enlisted men are not treated as they should be treated, and because their pay is entirely inadequate. I want the enlisted men treated better and paid more.

This matter was carefully considered in the committee, and the committee agreed to the increase of pay of the enlisted men. If I had my way, I would be willing to make the pay of the soldiers more than is provided for in this conference report. The committee of the House did not touch upon the increased pay of the officers. It was thought advisable to pass the bill in the House with the increase of pay only for the enlisted men, but the Senate in the meantime passed a bill increasing the pay of the officers, and that bill is now pending. When the House appropriation bill went over to the Senate it was amended and the whole matter went to conference. The increased pay for the officers is a very small item. It gives cadets at West Point $100 a year more. It gives colonels, brigadiers, and major-generals $500 a year more. Their salaries have not been increased in forty years, whereas the expense of living during that time has very materially increased. It was represented to the committee by the officers of the Army that the increased cost of living in the city of Washington and other places throughout the country was at least 35 per cent, and their salaries for forty years had remained practically the same. They appealed to us to give them a very material increase. The best they can get at present it seems is this increase of about $500 a year. Now, I do not think that is too much. I do not think this small increase is going to be a great burden on the taxpayers of the country.

These officers are most efficient men. They do a great work for the Government in various lines of usefulness—especially engineering work. They have got to live in accordance with the positions they occupy. They are cultivated, accomplished gentlemen. They have to entertain more or less. They have to dress well. They have families. They can not live as they are expected to live on the pay they are now receiving, and I am willing for one, as a Member of this House, and as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, to pay the officers decent salaries to live on, and to pay the soldiers of the Army adequately, justly, and fairly, because I want to see in the American Army the best men we can get in the country, and we are not getting the best men at present, and the reason is because we do not pay them enough wages.

The officers of the Army have been educated at West Point, have gone into the Army and remained in the Army; they are the men who do our great engineering work from one end of the country to the other, great work of which we are all proud, and for which we appropriate millions and millions of dollars every year; and I am willing to pay them decent wages, so that they can live in accordance with the positions they are expected to occupy. These men do not have the opportunities to make money other men have in other walks of life. They can not go into various enterprises to make money. They are entirely dependent on their salaries. The opportunities of money-making are all closed to them, and they are compelled to depend, not only themselves but their families, upon the pay they get as Army officers. This small increase is not too much. In the opinion of many it is not enough.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What per cent do we increase the salaries of these officers?

Mr. SULZER. We increase them about $500 a year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But what per cent?

Mr. SULZER. Less than 10 per cent. An officer getting $6,000 a year, $500 increase would be less than 10 per cent, whereas the necessaries of life, as I pointed out, have gone up over 35 per cent, and I know myself from investigations I have made that the statements of the officers of the Army who appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs and submitted the data, which is a matter of record, are absolutely true so far as the increased cost of living is concerned——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a few minutes more. I want to answer any questions submitted.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. SULZER. Just a few minutes more.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Since you answered my question a minute ago that the raise was about 10 per cent, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] informs me that they are raised about 40 or 50 per cent.

Mr. HAY. In the lower ranks.

Mr. SULZER. That is for the enlisted men.

Mr. HAY. No; first and second lieutenants.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman from Virginia, as I understand it, has no objection to the increase in pay for the enlisted men.

Mr. HAY. I said to the gentleman from Tennessee the lieutenants were increased about 40 per cent under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is it not true that when they move, say from Fort Myer, out here, to some other station the Government gives them mileage and pays for carrying their furniture? Is that correct?

Mr. SULZER. Not for carrying their furniture.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Three thousand pounds to each officer.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That amounts to nothing.

Mr. SULZER. Not much in moving.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, the increased cost of living, according to the evidence before your committee, is how much?

Mr. SULZER. In the last ten years or so it is about 35 per cent.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he considers the increase recommended by the conference committee or the Senate as commensurate with the increase in the cost of living?

Mr. SULZER. Not at all, not at all; entirely too little.

Mr. GOULDEN. You think the cost of living is much larger in proportion than the advance made along the line of increase?

Mr. SULZER. The cost of living has increased at least 35 per cent, and we are giving the officers an increase of salary of less than 10 per cent.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think it fair to charge up to these officers, because we give them a furnished room to live in—that is the short of the proposition, the furniture, and so forth—does the gentleman think that should be taken into consideration in fixing their pay?

Mr. SULZER. Oh, yes; that is taken into consideration.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the increase in compensation in one sense take that into consideration?

Mr. SULZER. Yes. It is part of the compensation that is always taken into consideration, of course. But, as a matter of fact, I want to say that if we want an army of which we can be proud, we have got to pay the enlisted men decent wages, and we have to pay the officers of the Army living salaries.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What do you call decent wages for an enlisted man?

Mr. SULZER. Enough to live on decently and save a little for a rainy day. The enlisted men, I think, have been pretty fairly dealt with in this bill. I would be willing, however, to give the enlisted men a little more than they will get under this proposed amendment, but I am satisfied, and I understand the enlisted men of the Army are pretty well satisfied, with the increase pay carried in this bill. However, I think the officers of the Army ought to receive more pay than they get now or will get under this proposed increase. I would be willing to vote for more. I believe in economy, but I believe in practical economy. I do not want to be penny wise and pound foolish; and the commentary I would make on the legislation of this Congress is that when it comes to appropriating millions of dollars for some matter in which very few people are interested it is done unhesitatingly, but when it comes to appropriating money for the men who are really entitled to it we quibble about it. We strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. It is everything for the few, very little for the many.

We do not legislate fairly and justly for the best interests of all concerned, but that is what we should do.

Now, sir, I believe that this conference report is the best report that the House can get. I believe that the conferees have done the best they could to come to an agreement, and, having reached this agreement, I am in favor of the House adopting the conference report. I shall vote for it, and I hope it will be adopted. If it is adopted and these increases of pay become law, we will find that the personnel of the Army will be very much improved in all respects. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman can use some more of his time. I have very little remaining, and I must reserve that largely.

Mr. HAY. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, when the Army appropriation bill was before the House and that paragraph increasing the pay of the enlisted men was under consideration I reserved the point of order, and the merits of the proposition were discussed. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] informed the House that he was not in favor of increasing the pay of the officers of the Army and did not feel that we were justified in doing that at this time.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will yield to the gentleman time, if he will allow me to correct him. I did not state anything of the kind. I stated that no doubt the Senate would put it on and a proper increase should be made, instead of saying what the gentleman says I did.

Mr. TAWNEY. My recollection is that the gentleman not only said that, but said that he would resist the proposition to increase the pay of the officers of the Army.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I challenge that absolutely. There is not a word of truth in it.

Mr. TAWNEY. The proposition was then before the committee as to whether or not the proposed increase for the enlisted men should be carried in the Army appropriation bill.

I took the position upon that occasion to say that if we carried the provision, which I was in favor of, to increase the pay of the enlisted men, in the Army appropriation bill, it would afford an opportunity for the Senate to increase also by amendment the pay of the officers of the Army. And at that time the sentiment of the House was universally opposed to the proposed increase of the pay of the officers of the Army, either on the active or the retired list.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAWNEY. Just a minute. Now, another proposition that was considered by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and voted down was $1,000,000 for maneuvers of the Army, the "grand maneuvers," as they are called, during the next fiscal year. That proposition the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] himself made a speech against, and it was rejected by the committee. That amendment has gone into the Army appropriation bill in the Senate and has been agreed to by the House conferees.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I was opposed to it.

Mr. TAWNEY. And the gentleman stated to the House what is the fact, that the Military Committee in reporting this bill to the House, instead of appropriating $1,000,000 for these maneuvers, had given to the Secretary of War power and authority to send the regular troops to the State encampments, and that the necessary expenditures for that purpose had been provided for in the bill, and would be made for the purpose of giving to the State troops the benefit of this participation in maneuvers with the Regular Army troops. The Senate amended the House bill, putting in the $1,000,000 for the maneuvers, and the bill also carries the appropriation to defray the expense of sending the regular troops to the State encampments in addition to that.

Now, he informs us that the increase in the pay of the enlisted men of the Army is $5,000,000 as carried in this bill. When the bill was before the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union he stated that that would not be the maximum increase; that it would be the minimum increase, because this increase would encourage additional enlistments; the aggregate, he said, would be $8,000,000 or $9,000,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, to that has been added over $2,000,000 for increase of the pay of the officers of the Army.

The total increase carried by the bill over the amount the bill carried when it went to the Senate is $10,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, there has nothing been said as yet as to what the items are that go to make up the greater portion of the $10,000,000 increase. The increase in the pay of the enlisted men was authorized in the bill that passed the House. The addition of $2,000,000 or over is for the increase of pay of the officers.

Then, in addition to that, there is $1,000,000 for maneuvers that has been added. Now, what items go to make up the balance of the $10,000,000 I do not know. I submit, Mr. Speaker, in all fairness the gentleman from Iowa—in view of the action of the House in respect to the appropriation of $1,000,000 for maneuvers, and in respect to the sentiment of the House on the subject of the increased pay of the officers of the Army—ought to have brought that bill back so that the House would have had an opportunity to consider the several increases, particularly those on which the House had previously expressed an adverse opinion. Instead of that, the report comes back here in the form of a complete agreement, with no opportunity for the House to vote specifically on any one of these items, it matters not what its judgment might be as to the advisability of making the increases proposed by the Senate. When you propose to increase the expense of the Army above the amount appropriated for the current year to the extent of $17,000,000, I submit that the House is not only entitled to know the several items of increase, but to have the right to a separate vote on some of them—at least the most important—and especially those regarding which the House had previously given an adverse vote.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Why would it not be well to modify the special rule so that we could give justice to these particular items?

Mr. TAWNEY. The rule under which we are operating does not change the situation. If we were operating under the ordinary rules of the House, the conditions would be exactly the same. This report is a complete agreement and is not subject to amendment. This is a complete report—a complete agreement—so if there is any item in the report which the House does not approve of, the only recourse the House has is to reject the report and send the bill back to conference.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Suppose this report is voted down. If the gentleman's argument means anything, then he proposes to take up these items specifically and pass upon each where there is a difference of opinion?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am not in favor of that.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is what you would do.

Mr. TAWNEY. But I am in favor of giving to the House further opportunity to insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments, and that the gentleman from Iowa may take the bill back to conference. I am satisfied that if that is done, he will bring the bill back here carrying a less amount than it carries now, or that the House will be given an opportunity to give specific instructions regarding items that it does not agree to.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this matter of war expenses is one that the House is quite familiar with. But the rate of increases this year in Army and Navy expenditures is greater than it ever has been in the sixteen years that I have served in this House, greater than it has ever been since the gentleman from Iowa has been chairman of the Military Committee, except in time of war. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that when we are confronted, as we are to-day, with decreasing revenues, with a large deficit, there is no man that can justify increasing the pay of the Army officers or increasing the pay of the 900 officers, I think the gentleman from Iowa said, on the retired list, aggregating in all for the retired officers over $500,000, as stated by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]. I say that in view of our present situation, in view of the condition of the Treasury of the United States, no man can justify before the American people this enormous increase in war expenses when we have not got the money to meet them and when there is no imminent danger threatening our Government or our country requiring these enormous additional war expenditures.

In all fairness to the House, I submit that this committee of conference ought to have brought back this bill so as to give the House an opportunity to express its judgment in regard to the items that it voted down when the bill was before the House on a former occasion, and that in regard to the increase in the pay of the officers, this House ought to have an opportunity to express itself specifically upon that proposed increase. But in the parliamentary situation as it is now no man can have a separate vote on any item in this report. We must vote it up or vote it down; no matter how objectionable some of these items may be, we have no opportunity to express by our vote our dissent to those propositions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the report is voted down or rejected, the House would then further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments and ask for another conference; and I believe that I am not stating that which the gentleman from Iowa would disagree to when I say that if this bill is sent to conference again it will be brought back here with a less amount authorized, or afford the House the opportunity to express its judgment on these two important items, items that can not be voted upon unless the report is rejected. I therefore hope the report will be rejected in order that we may have an opportunity to express our further disagreement to the Senate amendments in order that the conferees may continue their conference with a view to reducing these expenditures, or at least with a view of giving to the House an opportunity of voting on the most important items in disagreement. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. COCKRAN. I have listened with much interest to this debate, and I must confess with some surprise at the attitude of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], who, appearing to recognize in at least part of his speech that some of our Army officers are underpaid, yet seemed to feel that the condition of our finances would justify the country in refusing to meet its obligations to this very deserving class of public servants.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if we are to have an Army at all—I am one of those who gladly welcome a reduction in it—it is incumbent upon us to provide against one condition which has resulted in every country that undertakes to maintain a standing army. In every other country where a standing army of any size exists the officers are composed entirely of men with independent fortunes. Officers are underpaid for the express purpose of excluding from that number all men who are not possessed of private means. Now, if this House declines to provide adequate compensation for officers of our Army, there can be no alternative except either to be content with the service of inferior men, men of inferior equipment and preparation, or else to depend entirely upon men able to support themselves independently of the pay allowed by the Government.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] described the compensation of a young man leaving West Point as adequate. He said it was some $1,400 a year when the young man joined the regiment, and that one year afterwards he becomes entitled to an increase of 10 per cent, which allows him about $1,500. The gentleman did not state that under the rules of the service the officer must provide himself with an outfit costing some $800. That outfit must be maintained, which means that in some respects it must be renewed from year to year. The cost of providing and maintaining that outfit is a reduction in the amount of his pay that leaves him less than $1,000 a year. It is idle to expect that any man of the abilities and preparation which are qualifications for entry into the United States Army and for remaining in it will be content to accept a career where, according to the gentleman himself, at the end of twenty years' service, he can hope to attain as a captain the munificent compensation of $2,800 a year and supply his own equipment out of that.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that these officers of our Army are the best qualified in all the world for the discharge of military duties. There is no other military service which exacts such thorough preparation from persons seeking commissions as the United States Army. The standard of qualification required, not merely for admission, but for remaining in the Army, is higher than anywhere else in the world. And if we are to maintain this Army as a citizen force, representative of the entire citizenship of our country, we must be satisfied to make sufficient provision for reasonable compensation to the men drawn from all walks of life who officer it.

Sir, when I realize that Members of this House increased their own compensation 50 per cent but one year ago; that we are now the highest-paid legislators in all the world—for there is not in all civilization a nation that pays its legislators, if my recollection is correct, one-half what we receive—it is little short of scandalous that we should be urged on the score of economy to leave officers of our Army, especially those of the inferior grades, grossly underpaid, when we come to consider the cost of living throughout the country. When a proposal is made here in this House to provide them with nothing beyond the necessary means of securing the absolute necessaries of life, to pay them a smaller compensation by one-half than any man would receive in any other walk of life with qualifications equal to theirs, we are met with the statement that this being an inauspicious season, we can not afford to be just; and this declaration of poverty is made on this floor at the same moment that are own pockets are bulging out with a compensation for public service generous beyond parallel in the experience of mankind.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will not assume an attitude so little creditable to its dignity, its patriotism, or its sense of justice. [Applause.] I trust this very moderate provision for reasonable pay to our officers will prevail.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I shall only ask the attention of the House to one feature of the conference report, and if there were no other reasons for opposing the adoption of it, that one provision would determine me to vote against it. The amended bill as brought in with the conference report has this paragraph:

> And the pay of cadets at the Military Academy shall hereafter be $600 a year.

A large number of the Members in this House do not know, I take it, what the real compensation of cadets at the Military Academy is.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Does that include equipment?

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the gentleman from New Jersey will possess himself with patience I will endeavor to explain these points. In 1902, on June 28, the Military Academy bill for the succeeding fiscal year was approved. It contained this paragraph:

> That hereafter the pay of cadets shall be fixed at $500 per annum and one ration per day, with commutation thereof, such commutation to be at 30 cents per day.

So that by the act of June 28, 1902, the compensation of cadets at the Military Academy was fixed at $609 per year. Now, the proposition brought in by the conference committee is that we shall pay the cadets at the Military Academy $709 per year. I concede every virtue and every high quality that gentlemen claim for them, but to pay them $709 a year to go into the most comfortable quarters that any school on earth, as far as I know, possesses, to receive education at the public expense, to be provided with a profession for life, is preposterous in my judgment. It is excessive overpayment.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Is it not a fact that every cent of this alleged compensation is charged up against them by the institution known as the "academy?" The gentleman does not mean to say that at the end of the year they have any of it left?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have not meant to say anything of the kind. The cadets are compelled to buy their clothing; they are compelled to pay for their food——

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. And they pay for blacking their boots.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But they get both at cost. They are housed and educated; they are furnished with clothing at cost, they are furnished with food at cost, and both of the very highest quality. Let us contrast their situation with that of other Government servants. Only a few days ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] called attention to the case of a lighthouse keeper within his own personal knowledge, the head of a family, a man doing valuable public service, a man who had a wife and two children dependent upon him, whose compensation was $520 per year.

I dare say that except, perhaps, in that locality known as the "island of Manhattan," where everything seems to be pitched upon a high and, I believe, artificial scale, where men possess more talent, where bookkeepers earn fortunes each year, where they receive a compensation altogether out of proportion to that paid men of equal ability for the same service in other parts of the country—these cadets are paid more to receive an education and to take a commission providing them with an honorable profession and a certain living for the balance of their lives than the majority of the heads of families throughout the country—always excepting New York—receive for their services.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman kindly inform us what percentage of cadets after graduation leave the Army and enter civil life?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I can not tell the gentleman what percentage leaves the academy or the Army and enter civil life. I think it is a very small percentage.

Mr. SULZER. I was going to say very few.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I can not yield, Mr. Speaker, for the gentleman's interruption. The suggestion has been made that a cadet necessarily has to pay $800 for uniforms on graduation. That is not so. The statement has been made that it has to be renewed every year. I dare say except for an occasional fop in the military service, just as we find an occasional fop in civil life, who is in possession of a large income, that there are not half a dozen officers in the United States Army who pay $800 a year for uniforms. [Applause.] This paragraph alone, which incites to extravagance, will justify the rejection of the report.

Mr. HAY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote to disagree with this conference report. It seems astounding that in a time of profound peace, without any threatening clouds of war, without proposing to add a single man to the Army of the United States, the proposed appropriation for the next fiscal year for the Army should exceed the appropriation for this year by more than $17,000,000. It is immaterial to me whether this is due to an increase in the compensation of the officers and men or whether it is due to other items in the bill. It can not be justified, even if the Treasury were overflowing, instead of facing a tremendous deficit. This day last year the receipts exceeded the expenditures of the Government by $60,480,121.33. To-day for the present year the expenditures exceed the receipts by $54,130,538.28, a difference in the condition of the Treasury to-day and this time last year of $114,610,659.61. It has been repeatedly pointed out here that this year, despite the prediction of the Secretary of the Treasury that there would be in this fiscal year a surplus of about $42,000,000, there will be a deficit of from $70,000,000 to $85,000,000. In the coming year the deficit will be much greater. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] at the opening of this session called the attention of the country to the fact that the estimates for the public service for the coming fiscal year were $118,000,000 in excess of the anticipated revenues. He then stated that it would be possible to appropriate $100,000,000 less than the administration asked without interfering in the slightest degree with the efficiency of the administration. Within a week he has called the attention of the country to the fact that this House has reported appropriation bills carrying $99,000,000 less than the estimates of the administration, and that if the bills were enacted as reported by the House committees the efficiency of administration of the public service would not be impaired.

The Army bill passed the House carrying $84,000,000, about $5,000,000 less than the estimates. The Senate has added $11,000,000, making it $6,000,000 more than the estimates. How long do Members of this House believe that the Congress can continue, not only to appropriate up to the estimates this year, $118,000,000 in excess of the anticipated revenues, but 15 per cent in addition to the estimates, which are so much in excess of the anticipated revenues?

Mr. Speaker, I have had some experience in the city of New York within a not very distant period. I know somewhat of the compensation that men are able to earn there. Seventeen years ago I was graduated from college, and after spending two years in a law school I was admitted to the bar, just fifteen years ago this month. I was like all—if not, 90 per cent—of the 220 young men in my class in the law school. I was glad to take a position as a law clerk at $10 a week, and I undertake to say that not only then, but now, unless the average graduate of the law schools, who has been admitted to the bar, has been greatly favored by fortune or has rich connections or associations who are ready to pay him out of all proportion to the services that he is able to render, the young man is lucky to-day to receive $10 a week in any law office upon being graduated from a law school.

Mr. COCKRAN. Would the gentleman have accepted at that time any compensation that would have limited him to earning $2,800 a year after forty years' service in his profession?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I should have welcomed the opportunity to have entered some profession at that time which would have guaranteed to me at the end of a life of activity and usefulness a support for the rest of my life out of the Public Treasury of the United States. [Applause.] That is what these young men in the Army have. No man in civil life can expect that some great and beneficent government will provide for him when he is incapacitated, but he must depend upon his own exertions to put by the competency upon which he can live during the declining years of his life.

Mr. LANDIS rose.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANDIS. I will ask the gentleman from Iowa to grant me half a minute in which to ask a question.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield half a minute for that purpose.

Mr. LANDIS. I want to make this statement, which I consider a great tribute to opportunity in New York and a complete answer to the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. Col. J. B. Curtis commanded a battery in the Spanish-American war. There were 175 men in that battery. After service in Porto Rico the regiment landed in New York City and Colonel Curtis and a number of the members of the battery located there instead of going back to Indiana. He told me recently that he had kept track of all of them and that seventeen of them were now enjoying salaries in excess of $5,000 per year. Not one of them could have hoped for such compensation had they remained in the service.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, Mr. Speaker, everybody living in the city of New York has not been so fortunate as to have been born in the State of Indiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. It is a wonder there is any population left in Indiana.

Mr. LANDIS. While I question their judgment and wisdom in leaving Indiana, I submit that that is a complete answer to the argument advanced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. MANN. If it were, the gentleman would have no constituents. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I referred to the debate on the provision increasing the pay of the Army which occurred when the Army appropriation was under consideration in the House. At that time, as all the Members of the House who were present will recall, the only question before the House was the question of increasing the pay of the enlisted men, which I favored. I read from the RECORD of the first session of this Congress, page 2617. I was addressing a question to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I said:

> Is it not also a fact that the pressure for increasing the compensation of the officers of the Army is even stronger, and that there is an organized effort in that direction much greater than there has been to increase the pay of the enlisted men?
> Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, there has been, of course, an effort to increase the pay of the officers, and I think in a sense it is a proper question to be discussed.

Then, again, on page 2617, the gentleman from Iowa said:

> Then the question of increase would also be determined somewhat by whether that provision would apply to those on the retired list (referring to officers). If it did not, you would reduce it by $250,000.

Then, again, he went on to say:

> I want to say to my friend that there has been a tentative talk among the members of the committee of an increase which would commence with a brigadier-general and give him $500 a year additional salary, which would make his pay the same as the pay of a rear-admiral of the junior grade in the Navy.

Then he goes on and enumerates what was embraced in this tentative talk among the members of the Committee on Military Affairs on the subject of increasing the pay of officers, and he said:

> That is a matter that should be taken up if the measure is brought before us and fully debated and discussed. The proposition here is simply to increase the pay of the enlisted force of the Army.

Then, again, Mr. HULL said:

> I would like to ask the gentleman a question right there. That is one of the points; the committee believed it was better to put it on here, and we could control it better than we could if it was in a separate and independent measure. Is it not always the rule that the House making the amendment, if the other House will not agree to it, must recede?

Now, Mr. Speaker, this shows that this whole question of the increase of the pay of the officers of the Army when the matter was before the House was conceded to be a matter that should be fully discussed and considered. That statement was made by the gentleman from Iowa himself. Now, it is proposed to smuggle this proposition through the House in a conference report and deprive the Members of the House of the opportunity of expressing their opinion by their vote on this proposition, and the same is also true of the proposition that this House voted down an appropriation of a million dollars for maneuvers, and I submit under all the circumstances, this being an important proposition, involving an increase of several millions not only for the next year, but a permanent charge upon the revenues for years to come. Mr. Speaker, this we are asked to do without an opportunity to consider or vote upon the proposition. If this is not abdicating our legislative function to a conference committee of the House, then I know of no way whereby this House can surrender that important prerogative. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is not fair to this House to ask the House to vote on the proposition without an opportunity for consideration and without an opportunity for a separate vote. I yield back whatever time I may have remaining.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the conference committee I had not thought that it was necessary to say anything in support of the very modest increase given, after forty years of increase of values and prices in this country, to the officers as well as to the men of our Army. I am forced to do so by the words of the gentleman who has just sat down and of his predecessor, who said they did not understand the increases in this bill. Four-fifths of the $7,000,000 is given to the men. They served in the civil war at $16 a month and they serve now at $13 a month, and we can not fill our Army in these days without paying them more. Part of it is for the noncommissioned officers, because in order to have a good army there must be good noncommissioned officers who will stay in that army. The pay of commissioned officers was thought worthy of consideration, and the chairman of this committee so stated in the House, but he thought then that we had to make one step at a time. Mr. Speaker, it is likely that we can not make any step at all unless we take both steps now, because it is thought fair and insisted that a small increase should be made to the salaries of the officers. There are about 4,000 officers of the American Army, and of these there are 3,350 and odd who are captains, or of lower grade than captains. It would take a man, therefore, out of the average forty years' service in time of peace, five-sixths of that forty years, or certainly over twenty-five years, to get above the pay of a captain.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I hope the gentleman will now conclude. I desire to finish in one speech.

Mr. HAY. Is the gentleman going to conclude his remarks in one speech?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I am.

Mr. HAY. I do not care to use any more of my time.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota has not treated this question with the fairness that a man occupying his great position in this House should have exhibited. In his first statement of my position on the increased pay to officers he misstated it absolutely, as the small portion of my remarks at the time this bill was before the House that he read conclusively proves. He did quote one statement of mine correctly, that it was understood in my mind at that time that where the one House would not agree to an amendment of the other the House proposing the amendment must recede. But I desire to read what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] said on that when I made the statement.

He said:

No. If it is an amendment to an appropriation, but that rule does not obtain if it is an amendment to legislation.

This he held was an amendment to legislation, and therefore the Senate had just as much right to amend to put in the officers as the House had the right to amend to increase the pay of the men. In this he was right.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you think that gave the conferees the power or authority to legislate on a subject that had not even been brought to the attention of the House?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We legislated on an appropriation bill, and I stated to the House in all frankness at that time, directly and positively, that this was laying the foundation for an amendment on the part of the Senate to increase the pay of officers; that it had been discussed by the Military Committee of the House, and that we had determined to put in, first, the men, and then consider the other when it came up.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman lays great stress upon this idea of the separate consideration of all these amendments treated in conference. He will not bring in during this Congress any conference report that will open to discussion each individual amendment of his report. The idea will be in his case, as in all others, to get a full agreement, if possible, and dispose of it with one vote. If this report is voted down, as he hopes it will be, it will not lead to a discussion of each individual amendment, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] would himself oppose any proposition of that kind. We must either reject all or accept all.

I want to say a word as to the maneuvers. He lays great stress on the fact that there is $1,000,000 here for maneuvers this year, and he also lays stress on the fact that I opposed this proposition. I did oppose it then, and I opposed it in conference, and I am not in favor of it now. I do not believe we ought to have it. I believe it is a million of dollars that could be better expended in many other ways.

But what did the House do on that? On a test vote this House voted by just one majority to keep from inserting it in the bill—just one majority on tellers—and they voted us down on the rising vote. And at least four Members that voted with me at that time stated that they were opposed to my position, did not want to see the committee turned down on it, but they hoped the Senate would put it in. When it came back here they gave notice they would vote to concur in the amendment, and I have no doubt on earth that if it was a separate proposition, to be determined on its merits on the roll call of this House, the pressure from the National Guards of the different States would insure the adoption of that amendment of a million dollars by a large majority. The gentleman talks about an increase of $17,000,000 made by the Senate in this bill. The bill as it passed the House carried in round numbers $85,000,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Seventeen million dollars is over the current law. If I said that the increase was above the amount carried as the bill left the House, it was an error, and I subsequently corrected it.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We passed the bill in the House that in round numbers carried $85,000,000. It came back from the Senate carrying in round numbers $98,000,000, an increase of $13,000,000. In conference this amount was reduced to $95,000,000. But over $5,000,000 of this was provided for when this House increased the pay of the enlisted men of the Army. We did not increase the amount appropriated, because, as I stated at that time, it was impossible to tell what would be the final agreement as to the pay of the enlisted men of the Army, and when we reached that agreement, we could then fix the amount. But the House remembers that I gave notice at that time that the increase would be, approximately, $5,000,000. So that disposes of half of the amount. Then we put the $1,000,000 back for maneuvers. I was not in favor of it. The conferees on the part of the House, and a majority of this House, is in favor of this. We recommended an increase of at least $300,000 more for transportation of the Army and its supplies on account of maneuvers than would otherwise have been given. We increased the ration allowance $500,000, because they have increased the value of the ration.

They increased, in addition to that, $200,000 for medical supplies, to prepare a reserve amount that had been estimated for, but not considered by the committee on the part of the House and not submitted to the House. They increased also the different lines of transportation of the Army and its supplies, coming up not much beyond what the current law carries, when you consider what was given by the Military Committee and the deficiencies that were added by the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. All time has expired.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to put in my remarks exactly what this increase is for the different grades of officers:

668 officers, majors and above, $500 each	$334,000
2,500 officers, captains and first lieutenants, $500 each	1,250,000
828 officers, second lieutenants, $300 each	248,400
Total	1,832,400

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and agree to the conference report.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Division!

The House divided, and there were—ayes 17, noes 61.

Mr. HAY. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 141, nays 92, answered "present" 15, not voting 139, as follows:

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin (against) with Mr. WILEY (in favor of).

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

PORTO RICO PROVISIONAL REGIMENT.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, with the amendments recommended by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18618) fixing the status of the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the 30th day of June, 1908, the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry shall be designated the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry of the United States Army. It shall be composed of the two existing battalions of the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry.

SEC. 2. That the field officers of said regiment shall be one lieutenant-colonel and two majors, who shall be detailed for four years by the President from officers not below the rank of captain of the Army.

SEC. 3. That the present captains and lieutenants of the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry who have had not less than five years' service therein, and who were reappointed after a mental, physical, and professional examination, may be recommissioned as officers of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry.

SEC. 4. That the lieutenants, natives of Porto Rico, now holding provisional commissions, may continue to serve until the expiration of such commissions, when, after an examination as to their mental, physical, and professional fitness, they may be recommissioned as officers of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry.

SEC. 5. That vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant may be filled by the President, in his discretion, by the appointment of citizens of Porto Rico whose qualifications for commissions shall be established by examination.

SEC. 6. That promotions to the grade of first lieutenant and captain shall be according to seniority within the regiment, subject to the examination provided by law. All appointments and promotions herein provided for shall be made with the advice and consent of the Senate. Officers of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry shall have the same rank, pay, rights, and allowances provided by law for officers of similar rank in the Army of the United States, except as herein provided with regard to promotion. Any of the officers provided for by section 3 who may have become incapacitated for active service by reason of disability incident to the service shall be placed upon the retired list with the rank to which they would otherwise be entitled.

SEC. 7. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OVERSTREET). Under the rule the second is considered as ordered. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I think I can explain the bill to the House in a few words. The House is familiar with the question, I think, especially the older Members, that at the conclusion of the Spanish war, when we acquired sovereignty of Porto Rico, in an appropriation bill there was a provision made for a provisional regiment. Under that provision the colonel, lieutenant-colonel, major, and all the captains were appointed from the United States; the lieutenants were largely appointed from the noncommissioned force of the Regular Army. That has been gradually broadened, until to-day the lieutenants are largely citizens of Porto Rico. There are two battalions there. It is proposed to make that force permanent in place of carrying it for each period of four years in an appropriation bill. It is a question, Mr. Speaker, whether it is not now permanent under the provision adopted four years ago in the appropriation bill. At that time, I will frankly say to the House, I did not believe in this regiment, and I did not really intend to concede its permanence under the provision agreed to by the Senate and the House; but the Judge-Advocate-General has declared it was a permanent continuance of the regiment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Four years ago, when we first had this talk about this Porto Rican battalion, did you not promise or intimate that just as quick as their term of service expired that you would join me and others in shaking that Porto Rican establishment from the service?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think that is true, substantially, though it is a little strong.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How would you reconcile that with now getting it in as a permanent force?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I was trying to say that when that bill was up in the House the gentleman will remember we refused the appropriation in the House, but the Senate put on a certain legislative enactment for it, and in the conference we agreed to a certain provision that provided for it absolutely for four years, and then provided for recommissioning the officers for periods of four years, and the Judge-Advocate-General declares that that makes it permanent.

Now, I want to say to my friend that I believe that I know more to-day than I did four years ago.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. And I am inclined to think that my friend from Missouri, if he was expressing his honest views, would admit that his opinions have changed somewhat on this subject.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course they have. Now, I want to ask you another question. Do you know of any way of getting rid of conferees or conference reports in general? If you do, I should like to have you state it.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; I do not. I can see no way on earth of accomplishing anything of that kind.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How many men does this battalion carry?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. This regiment carries two battalions of four companies each.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One hundred and nine men in a company?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; this is not an artillery company. It is a company of 100 men, when on a war basis, with the company at full strength, 96 enlisted men besides the officers. But, Mr. Speaker, this will make it permanent, and on a peace basis provide for 65 enlisted men to the company.

It abolishes the grade of colonel. It creates the highest office in the regiment, a lieutenant-colonel, whose command is two battalions. But this officer is detailed from officers now in the Regular Army.

Mr. HAY. There never was a colonel of this regiment.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There was in the first place, I think. This provides that up to the grade of captain the Porto Ricans who can pass the examination may be promoted. It releases the captains that are there from the Regular Army, if any, as this promotion comes up. It makes them permanent officers of the Army, and the only difference, as I have already stated, is that these Porto Ricans may be promoted, and it gives them a status on the retired list. That is the effect of this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Porto Ricans are said to be the most peaceable people living under our flag, are they not?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why do they want this regiment at all, then?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We want it because it is a splendid education for these people, and if a war ever comes on the Isthmus we have a trained force of enlisted men going back among the people on the expiration of their enlistment educated in military science, and also educated to the love of the flag. There is no one thing that we have ever done for Porto Rico that is so highly appreciated by all of the people of the island as the establishment of this regiment of Porto Rican troops.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I should prefer that the gentleman take his own time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want information from the gentleman.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman from Texas is full of information.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I can not give the gentleman from Iowa any information.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield, of course, to my friend for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This regiment as it stands is a sort of Porto Rican national guard regiment, is it not?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is a Porto Rican regiment that serves in that island, but that could be sent to the Isthmus or any place that we wanted to send it. It is the understanding that it is largely for the benefit of the islanders at home.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Its relations toward the service are those of a regiment in the National Guard?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, not at all. The National Guard does not stay in the service. This is for all practical purposes a regiment of the Regular Army, or two battalions, two-thirds of a regiment of the Regular Army. The men are not engaged in any civil employment during their time of enlistment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not ask the gentleman what this regiment would be after the passage of this bill.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We do not change its status at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I asked the gentleman what it was now.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Just the same exactly as it will be after this bill passes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is not the object of this bill to make this regiment a part of the Regular Army?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; it is to make permanent what is now questionable, whether it is permanent or not, and, to be entirely frank with the gentleman, this regiment to-day is entirely engaged in the duties of drilling and policing, or whatever duty would come to that many regulars if they were there. The members of it have no civil employment. They are not permitted to do anything else outside of their military duties.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The only thing this bill does is this: It makes permanent what is now a four years' term. It limits, however, the promotion of officers to the grade of captain, all above that grade being detailed from the line of the Army.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What does it do in regard to the rank, pay, and retirement of officers; does it put them on the status of Army officers?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It does not, for this reason—a second lieutenant of the Regular Army can be promoted to all grades in the Regular Army, while the first and second lieutenants of this regiment are limited to promotion to the grade of captain, and never can go beyond it.

Mr. KEIFER. And they can only be promoted in this regiment and not in the general Army?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There can be no promotion except in the regiment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Who is the lieutenant-colonel of this regiment?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. He is a lieutenant-colonel of the Regular Army.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He is not a Porto Rican?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No, sir; the majors belong to the Regular Army, and this bill does not affect them at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A Porto Rican, under the bill, can not become a lieutenant-colonel?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No Porto Rican can ever become commander of a regiment?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not unless they go and graduate at West Point, and then they could have the same promotion as any other officer in the Regular Army. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, in response to the question submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi to the gentleman from Iowa, I will say that this bill adds thirty-two commissioned officers to the Regular Army of the United States. There are eight regimental captains, eight regimental first lieutenants, and eight regimental second lieutenants. For the battalions there is a quartermaster, a commissary, and adjutant—altogether eight more. That increases the official personnel of the Army of the United States by thirty-two men, conferring upon them all the privileges of retirement, giving them the advantages of the increase of pay and allowances that were adopted by this House a few minutes ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is there, in the gentleman's opinion, any greater reason why this should be done with regard to this regiment in Porto Rico than why it should be done in regard to any regiment of a National Guard in Texas or Mississippi?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; there is, I will say to the gentleman, some distinction, but I believe there is no more reason why this should be done in Porto Rico with reference to this regiment than why it should be done with the very considerable body of men in the Philippine Islands known as the "constabulary;" and I rather expect that before another Congress shall have come and gone the large body of men in the Philippine Islands, not in the Army and not out of it, occupying to some extent a similar position that this Porto Rican regiment has hitherto occupied, will also be incorporated with the Army of the United States.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This is the only military organization of the Army in Porto Rico?

Mr. SLAYDEN. We have some regular artillery down there.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. How many?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not know; I have the report of the Secretary of War that gives it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is not necessary to look it up. This is the only effectual military organization that can do ordinary duty throughout the islands?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The islands contain a million and a half in population, and if the regiment was disbanded would it not require the United States to send a regiment of regular troops down there and keep them there?

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the reports of the pacific nature of these people be true, if what the Commissioner from Porto Rico [Mr. LARRINAGA] tells me is true about their character and history, I should say no. He says in all their long political union with the Kingdom of Spain they never had such an important political division as to compel a resort to arms.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Would the gentleman discriminate against Porto Ricans because they are ordinarily a peaceful people and deny them this badge of confidence that we have in them as American citizens?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am grateful to the gentleman from Indiana for the use of the word "discrimination." I would not discriminate against the people of Porto Rico, but I would not add by one single man to the size of the United States Army, nor by one single dollar to the already great burden borne by the American people. He speaks of discrimination against the Porto Ricans. The Commissioner from the island of Porto Rico, Mr. LARRINAGA, who I regret to say is not present, spoke to me to-day about the discrimination in this bill against his people; he charges that sections 3 and 4 are a rank discrimination, and the language of the bill sustains the charge. He says it is a discrimination against the native officers, in that it compels them to submit to an examination, compels them to gain an admission to the regiment under conditions not imposed on other officers, and limits their promotion to the rank of captain, restrictions not applicable to Americans. He hopes to be here before this bill shall be put upon its passage, and will ask that it be amended by striking out sections 3 and 4.

Then, if I can have my way about it, we will strike out all the other sections.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG. Is it not a fact that the pay of this regiment will go on just the same, whether this bill passes or not?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think that is doubtful. My own impression is that under the specific terms of the law the regiment will cease to be an organization after the 30th of June.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. We have continued the appropriation.

Mr. YOUNG. We have continued the appropriation already for this purpose on the other bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. When did having an army get to be a benefit to the people? Most people think that it is an evil.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Just after we began having insular possessions and pro consuls whose glory was to be contributed to by military display.

Mr. KAHN. Is it not a fact that this regiment has been in existence for many years, probably several hundred years; that it has simply been continued down from the time of the Spanish possession?

Mr. SLAYDEN. No; it is not a fact. This regiment was created by act of the American Congress, and, please God, we have not had that sort of thing for several hundred years.

Mr. KAHN. Haven't they had the same regiment for many hundred years?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I dare say that all military organizations are similar in character, and I dare say that the Kingdom of Spain maintained a military organization in its colony just as we are doing now.

Mr. Speaker, I will not be able to yield to any more interruptions, because I want to give the balance of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]. But before yielding I do want to call attention to one or two statements made by the Secretary of War in his argument in support of this bill.

I think it hardly necessary to remind the House, as I have already done so on two or three previous occasions, that when the eminent man who now presides over the State Department was the Chief of the Department of War he recommended that it was not necessary to any longer continue the Porto Rican regiment. The people were peaceful. The Army of the United States was big enough to keep the peace, and therefore the burden of the support of this additional organization need not be further borne. However, another gentleman now presiding over the War Department and the Philippines and the Isthmus, and sundry other places in Ohio and Massachusetts and elsewhere, holds a different opinion. In a speech recently made at Columbus, Ohio, he frankly stated that the Army of the United States was not big enough, and I assume this is one of his ways of increasing the size of it. But I want to give the House the benefit of his statement as to the practical service rendered by this Porto Rican regiment. Mr. Secretary Taft says:

> I doubt if there is any one thing that makes the Porto Ricans feel so much like a part of our country as to have that regiment there, parading, drilling, maneuvering, and the only defense that the island has, substantially.

Parading, drilling, and maneuvering! Great stress is laid upon the fact that the people of Porto Rico delight to hear the band play in the plaza, that the people of the island of Porto Rico are pleased to have processions occasionally through their streets, that they were entranced with the military music, that they are persuaded that the military tread of these mighty heroes is an inspiration to heroic deeds on the part of the mixed population in our valuable gem of the Antilles. If there is any other argument that has ever been advanced anywhere by any gentleman that will justify the continuance of the appropriation and the maintenance of the regiment, I have never heard it. It is all summed up in that paragraph of the hearings before the committee, and in the statement of the Secretary of War, that it is the pomp and circumstance, the music, the banners, the plumes, the gorgeous uniforms that are attractive to the people and justify a continuance of the appropriation.

I now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I am not especially concerned as to whether or not the Republicans vote or do not vote for the passage of this bill, but I am concerned that the Democratic party shall not put itself on record as being in favor of adding any more officers or men to the Army of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is what this bill does. It adds forty-one officers to the Regular Army of the United States, and gives them the same status as officers in the Regular Army. As my colleague from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] has said, there has been no argument advanced for this except that it will be pleasing to the people on the island of Porto Rico. That is no reason at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from Virginia forgets that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], the chairman of the committee, said that this regiment was there as an education to the Porto Ricans. Precisely what education he did not state, but I would not have the gentleman from Virginia leave out any of the arguments.

Mr. HAY. Yes; to educate them up to the militarism which is prevailing in some parts of this country, I presume. I do not care to make any extended remarks about this bill. I do trust that we will vote against it. I call attention to the fact that the Senate has passed a bill adding 612 officers to the Army of the United States. I do not know whether that bill is to be brought here and passed under suspension of the rules or not, but it simply shows the tendency to increase the Army, to multiply expenses of the American people for military purposes in times of peace, and I think the time has come at least when the Democratic party can solemnly call a halt to this sort of legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. If the gentleman does not desire to use all of his time, I would be glad if he would yield part of it to the gentleman from Porto Rico.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I reserved the balance of my time. How much does the gentleman want?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. He wants all he can get.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question. A while ago I was diverted by the question of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair wishes to know if the gentleman is using his own time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am, Mr. Speaker. I desire to ask the gentleman what is the object of this language in section 6:

> Any of the officers provided for by section 3 who may have become incapacitated for active service by reason of disability incident to the service shall be placed upon the retired list at the rank to which they would otherwise be entitled.

I will be glad if the gentleman will answer that.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will say that if any officer is incapacitated for active service by reason of disability incident to the service it is competent to retire him.

Mr. SLAYDEN. In other words, this is to provide for some individual now.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; that is my understanding.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Who is the individual?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not know; I do not know any of their names. I would not remember their names if I knew them.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is the "nigger in the wood pile"——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. This is to provide for men being incapacitated. As soon as officers in the provisional regiment become incapacitated they may be placed on the retired list for incapacity.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The great objection we have to legislation for this regiment is that it has from the beginning been personal. The regiment would have gone out of existence long ago if officers with friends in Congress and throughout the country had not come here and urged that they be allowed to retain their commissions. I now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Porto Rico [Mr. LARRINAGA].

Mr. LARRINAGA. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to take up the sections of the bill in detail; I do not believe it is my place, and the details have already been discussed here; but I want to improve the opportunity, which the kindness of the gentleman from Texas gives me, to submit a few words about the convenience of the continuance of the regiment. I do not know whether it is so that the existence of the Porto Rico regiment is due to some officers having friends in Congress, as the gentleman from Texas has said, but if anything concerning Porto Rico is kept because it does good to somebody on this side, I am not at all surprised, because that has always been the rule in matters concerning Porto Rico. [Applause.] But be it as it may, I want to say a few words about the utility of this regiment. As I had occasion to say once before when speaking on this same matter, the Porto Ricans have proved their capacity to defend their country against foreign attacks from the seventeenth century on many occasions. The discontinuance of this regiment, I believe, would be a very unfair thing to do; its efficiency will only be doubted by those who have not taken the trouble to study the military history of Porto Rico. As I said before, we repelled the attacks of the English, of the Dutch, and of the French.

The Spanish army is full of Porto Rican officers from the rank of general, now living, to that of captain in that army. All the military academies of Spain were open to Porto Ricans. They have fought in all the wars which Spain has had for the last several centuries and they have never been discriminated against. They were free as soon as they passed the mental and physical examinations to go into any of the military academies of Spain, the artillery academy at Segovia, the infantry academy at Toledo, the military academy at Guadalajara, and so forth. In the ten years' war in Cuba many Porto Ricans went there, and a great many died on the battlefield helping the Cubans to fight for their independence. When in the last stage of the last Cuban war, right before the American declaration of war to Spain, General Maceo, commander of the department of the western part of the island, was killed, and Gen. Rius Rivera, a Porto Rican, had to take command of the army and fight every day, for there are no woods in the western part of Cuba, but he never surrendered. He was only taken prisoner when shot through his head and through one of his legs.

Mr. Speaker, the Porto Ricans as soldiers have a good record. Now, to those gentlemen who have said in the Philadelphia Press that they doubted the efficiency of the Porto Ricans as fighters I will say that standing right in front of Morro Castle there is a monument commemorating the action of the commander in chief of the Morro forces. That monument commemorates the signal victory achieved by a Porto Rican general commanding that fort.

Mr. Speaker, as I said before, the Spanish army is full of Porto Rican officers. It just happened that on the 12th of May, when the North Atlantic Squadron shelled the city of San Juan for four hours, which we all think was an error, the three commanders of the three forts of San Juan—the Morro, the San Cristobal, and Escambron—were three native Porto Rican captains. For four hours they answered shell by shell and shot by shot to the fleet. Of course they had nothing but 6-inch cannon and they did no harm. I am rather glad they did not. But, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is a most unkind campaign—the one that they are always waging against the Porto Ricans.

The press of the United States is full of slanders. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] the other day asked unanimous consent to put in the RECORD a letter published in the New York World that contained a good many inaccurate statements about Porto Rico and very wrongly interpreted a speech made by our leader in the house of delegates. Mr. Chairman, I have here a translation of that speech, and I ask unanimous consent of the House to have it inserted in the RECORD, so that the two papers may be compared.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Porto Rico asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD certain papers mentioned by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LARRINAGA. The gentleman from Texas, who is a fine Spanish scholar, can compare the original Spanish speech with the translation.

Mr. KIMBALL. Will the gentleman yield for a moment for a question?

Mr. LARRINAGA. Certainly.

Mr. KIMBALL. What is the attitude of the people of Porto Rico toward this regiment? Do they favor its continuance and maintenance under its present status? Do they favor the legislation proposed by this bill, or do they not? What do the people think about it?

Mr. LARRINAGA. The people of Porto Rico are unanimous to a man that the regiment should be made permanent as per the bill. One of the most unfair things to the people of Porto Rico was the abolishment by the Spanish Government of the seven Porto Rican militia regiments. So when the United States established this regiment the Porto Ricans took it as a token of friendship, consideration, and confidence.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman approve of this bill in all particulars? Does he indorse the bill throughout?

Mr. LARRINAGA. As the question is put to me, I will say that I observe some discrimination between officers here, and this should not be. I have spoken to different officials here in Washington, and they are of the opinion that there should not be any discrimination.

Now, in its third section, the bill says:

That the present captains and lieutenants of the Porto Rican Provisional Regiment of Infantry who having had not less than five years' service therein, and who were reappointed after a mental, physical, and professional examination, may be recommissioned as officers of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry.

Section 4 reads:

That the lieutenants, natives of Porto Rico, now holding provisional commissions, may continue to serve until the expiration of such commissions, when, after an examination as to their mental, physical, and professional fitness, they may be recommissioned as officers of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry.

Here I see that the five years' service line is traced to leave out the Americans in the question of examination. The Porto Rican officers are willing to be again examined and as often as required, but why should not the American also be examined? [Applause.]

The speech to which I referred, and asked to have inserted in the RECORD, is as follows:

Messrs. Delegates, we followed yesterday with extraordinary interest the brilliant report of the Speaker in his journey from Porto Rico to Oyster Bay, and from Oyster Bay to Porto Rico, stopping at New York, Washington, and Jamestown. I asked for a vote of gratitude for Mr. De Diego; the House unanimously and enthusiastically agreed to it. In commenting afterwards my ideas, somebody may have thought that there were disagreements and discrepancies between my illustrious compatriot who rendered the country such eminent services and myself. There are no such disagreements; there are no discrepancies. Mr. De Diego and I are going together in the same direction, and to-day, as well as yesterday, and to-morrow as well as to-day, we were always and will always be, in perfect accord in the idea and in absolute conformity in the procedure.

President Roosevelt, Secretary Taft, and Speaker CANNON came one day to Porto Rico. The three of them as if moved by the same impulse, declared that the people of Porto Rico were not prepared for self-government. In answering such statements which the people of Porto Rico find to be offensive to their dignity we drew and we sent our memorial. Mr. De Diego was the bearer of that extensive document; he delivered it personally to President Roosevelt; he accompanied it with eloquent periods; he strengthened it with his genial argumentation, and, gentlemen, he received in exchange the affirmation that the status was but only temporary.

New Mexico has lived under the régime for sixty years, and when it asks to be admitted as a State of the Union, the press answers it—I have read it in the New York papers—that New Mexico is not prepared; that New Mexico speaks Spanish, and does not yet possess the American spirit. If we are to wait sixty years for our autonomy, the present generation will have passed away, two more generations after us will pass, and we shall have gone not only through suffering and anguish, but we will have suffered, also, humiliation and shame. A people with dignity does not resign itself to this, but it arises and protests. When the lash is raised, the people protest in the same act—the same as I now protest, at this very moment, in the name of the people of Porto Rico. We saw the American Army land on our southern coast; we saw them advance through the roads of the interior; we heard the promises of General Miles; we knew the history of the United States, and this country almost unanimously—and I say "almost unanimously" because I never shared this mirage—believed that we were to be granted the liberties enjoyed in North America, and that there was to be a place for our country in the community of the free peoples of the world. Military rule was established. We understood it, and we accepted it. Such a transitory condition was imposed by the circumstances, and it was our duty to facilitate their work. We afforded such facilities. And after that came the civil régime, in which we put high and noble confidence. Governors arrived on our shores, there remained, and then left; but under them all a grave injustice was committed. The Porto Ricans, the natives of the island, were always placed under the Americans, the strenuous in the island.

It is the Venezuelans who rule in Venezuela, the French in France, the Teutons in Germany, and thus in all the other places of the globe. In Porto Rico the Porto Ricans do not govern; on the contrary, it is the will of a few functionaries, to whom the mission of civilizing and administering them is given, who rule. And it is not possible to suffer in silence that such a system should continue, and, at any price, it is necessary to speak the naked truth of our profound sorrow. The crudest argument used to refuse the recognition of our personality is the never-ending ritornello that we are not prepared. This is the eternal reason given by the strong who oppress the weak. Gentlemen, we must always bear in mind that in the opinion of the masters the servants are never prepared to come out of servitude. Thus in the opinion of the colonizing nations it never happened that they should consider their colonies prepared to enjoy the splendors of liberty. Such a phrase should not be allowed to a stranger; it is an insult. Much less should it be on the lips of a Porto Rican. And it is really very hard that a very few of our compatriots should also give utterance to it. There is no such thing as a slave country before God and nature. God and nature made free all countries on earth.

As to the Dominicans, to the Cubans—and I cite them because they are our nearest neighbors—ask them if they are prepared to govern themselves, and one single cry will answer the question from one end to the other of our sister islands; you will hear that single cry resounding in the highest mountains and in the seas. "We are free men; we want to be free men." Unfortunately the Porto Ricans are not, and it is for this reason that in struggling against a personal tyrannical government, there should rise at every step in our public life the acknowledgment of our sorry vassalage. But if it was given to open the breast of every one of the Porto Ricans, if it was possible to see into the collective soul of this million of human beings inhabiting this forgotten rock, we would find therein written in indelible characters, the word "Independence." [Continued applause.] This magnificent word has not yet been pronounced in this chamber as an energetic demand. Only my illustrious friend, Dr. Zeno Gandia wrote it in the declaration of principles of the Union of Porto Rico. Only my other illustrious friend, Mr. De Diego, supported it in brilliant periods in the convention of Olimpo amidst the most resounding applause as that which is now heard here. It is a confirmed idea; it is a sentiment which has been ratified. It is a sentiment and the opinion of the popular masses; condensed in the pen of the writers in the voice of their tribunes. It is the Porto Rican conscience taking real existence and going up to heaven as a complaint against our cruel destiny.

It is necessary for me to analyze and destroy the theory of our lack of preparation. The people of Cuba have our same origin, our own education, the same customs, but the people of Cuba were formed in the fight against tyranny. Cuba is in possession of the spirit of war; Porto Rico in the spirit of mansuetude and peace. The Congress of the United States recognized that Cuba deserves her independence and denies to Porto Rico self-government. And while Cuba expects that her ties should be broken, Porto Rico is less than a tribe, for tribes struggle and fight for their honor and existence. Porto Rico is but a pack of illards, submissive to the hard caprice of its masters. And maybe some one will wonder that a citizen may pronounce these words in this chamber. For those who may so think I have only my most generous pity.

Another reason, which they find of great weight, is given by our governing masters to prove the native inaptitude. This is the reason of our illiteracy. True it is that there are about 700,000 natives who do not know the first elements of learning. But what could we say of Syracuse and Alexandria, of Athens and Rome, which in the highest period of their progress barely had 5 per cent of learned men? Diffusion of learning began only shortly before the conquest of America, when Gutenberg discovered the art of fixing ideas on printed paper.

And yet the great civilizations of China and India had had their development; that civilization had gone over to the Greek and the Roman, had propagated through Gaul and Germany; nationalities arose, and in the somber centers of the middle ages the modern spirit was taking shape. With that 95 per cent of illiterates the Roman Empire reaches its great power and its splendid glory, the civil republic, in which the multitudes climbed to the Aventino Mountain and the czars went down to the Tarpeyan Rock. We, the descendents of that cyclopean effort, having inherited Latin culture, and having 30 per cent of literates, are doomed to see how the aptitude for self-government is denied to us.

One more argument which is used against us is the mixture of races in our country. The same exists in Cuba; in the United States there are 9,000,000 of colored people; and nobody would ever think that the Cubans and the Americans are not prepared for the self-government they enjoy. In Abysinnia there is a negro government; in Hayti the government is also of negroes; in Liberia, a creation of the American genius, the government is also of negroes. All nations established in Africa are constituted by negroes. Go and propose to them that they should renounce their liberties, and that they should submit to a master. They live happy in their homes, and their only misfortune is that every now and then the European thinks of them to go and enslave them.

And when this thing happens, the Sulus fight against the English, and the Abyssinians of Menelick rout the Italians of Baratiere. And when those people succumbed something in nature protests against the abuse of those who with their guns carry out their method and their plans. The colored people of Porto Rico, who fraternize with us, who jointly with us are in the struggle, show their aptitude for the exercise of political functions. And in this particular point we are superior to the United States, where the negro lives like a pariah in isolation and in the inferiority imposed by the white man.

I maintain that there is no reason to withhold from us the administration of our own business, of our own affairs.

The argument used by Spain in her colonies of America; that England used for her colonies of Africa; that France uses in Madagascar, and Russia in Finland and Poland, is a false argument that does not resist examination. Japan affirms that Korea is not prepared; the United States thinks that the Philippine Islands are not prepared. Ah, Mr. Delegates, we know that a country that one day was not prepared according to its masters, the next day was found to be prepared when it took hold of the sword and the gun and vindicated for itself by its right and its force. Thus, it seems to appear that there is no other road than the roads leading to the woods, if such a preparation is to be effected.

It is necessary that the victims should raise their voices and give vent to their sufferings. I raise my voice in the name of those victims. If I were alone, if I were to be left alone in the undertaking, I would live and die satisfied of having done my duty. [Great applause.] We Porto Ricans had a hundred causes of affection toward Spain. She gave us her blood, her laws, her language, and the pride of her legendary traditions and of her remarkable progress. The Madrid press received us fraternally when we went to claim firmly our rights; and yet we were called rebels. I was born in 1859. Spain retired from our shores in 1898, and although in my spirit the Spanish spirit was firmly rooted, never from my lips there came the hail of "Long live Spain!" Neither from the balconies of my home was the Spanish flag seen to wave, because more than a Spaniard I was a Porto Rican, and before the sovereignty of the nation I defended the autonomy of my country. In 1897 we went to Madrid and said: "Here comes the daughter to demand justice at the hands of the mother. Here comes Porto Rico to claim for the last time the recognition she deserves. If what we demand is not given to us, we shall return to Porto Rico; but we shall return by the way of New York."

To return by way of New York, Messrs. Delegates, meant open rebellion, with guns in our hands. Our rights were recognized, and we returned directly to Porto Rico, and right after us came a system of government more complete and more dignified than that of Canada and Australia.

Our hard feelings were turned into sincere love, because servitude had disappeared, because liberty was dawning. The same would occur in regard to the Americans. Before 1898 and after 1898 they had the confidence of our fellow-citizens. Their tricolor flag was hailed with respect and fondness. They arrived, and our sympathetic friendship continued, because we thought that the freedom enjoyed by the United States would be extended to Porto Rico, no longer in the form of the Latin autonomy of Moret and Sagasta, but in the shape of Anglo-Saxon autonomy prevailing in the British colonies. Instead of that we had the military government first and afterwards the civil government, with the Foraker Act, within which we see its autonomic and independent petty kings arising. This is the only kind of autonomy, the only kind of independence, that we have in Porto Rico. It would seem impossible that a people, speaking of our aptitude, would create bossism so absurd.

The statesmen at Washington thought that they had reached the limit of aptitude, and, in fact, they reached incredible anarchy. Those petty kings constitute a six-headed government; there is no government rule here, but misrule. The insular house, the only legitimate organism representing the people, carries out a useless labor, always wrecked on that perpetual reef, the executive council, formed of six Americans from the continent and six Americans from the island, appointed by the President of the United States.

The office of governor of the island is not a desirable one. The governor, in his relations to the system, lacks force and prestige, because as powerful as he, and even more so, are the heads of the departments, and the governor, in fact, is the one who governs the least; the direct power, the administrative functions are concentrated in the six offices which often act at variance with the governor. And in this way it is impossible to establish a fixed criterion, or a fixed policy. The leaders of the parties must confer with the governor, and with the six secretaries who are equal to the governor, and it often happens that in the executive mansion and in the various departments there are seven different opinions. It is a perfect gamut, with all the different tones, without the baton or the conductor being able to bring the whole orchestra into unison. [Great applause interrupts the orator.]

The inventors of this labyrinth find pleasure in repeating that we are not prepared. I wish to return this charge word for word, affirming here and repeating that the American statesmen are not prepared to govern foreign colonies so different in character and of such peculiar civilization. [Continued applause.] Four petitions did our house of delegates send to the President of the United States. None of them had the good fortune or the honor of an answer. President Roosevelt recommended to Congress that we should be made American citizens. Congress ignored the benevolent recommendation. I would say to Speaker CANNON, to that gentleman who, in our own house of delegates, reminded us of our so-called inferiority, I would tell Mr. CANNON that if American citizenship is going to be granted to us without the full rights of an American citizen; if it is only to consist in a mere formula, we prefer our Porto Rican citizenship. They may be proud of what belongs to them. I fully understand it, since there does not exist in the world a greatness superior to the greatness of the United States. But here we are proud of what belongs to us, that although poor and rachitic, it is our own. [Great applause.]

Mr. De Diego, my dear friend, and the worthy speaker of this house, gave us an account of his excursion through the United States in phrases admirable for their patriotism and rhetorical forms; that excursion was perhaps the most fruitful of all that have been carried out in representation of Porto Rico. I had the honor to go and plead the cause of my country in 1899. I accomplished nothing. Delegates from the Republicans, from the Federals, from the commerce and the agriculture, were later sent there. They accomplished nothing. In 1900 and 1902 the Republican party won the elections in the island, and sent to Washington one of our most competent men, my good friend and affectionate opponent, Mr. Degetau. He accomplished nothing. In 1904 and 1906 the Unionist party sent to Washington a man of exceptional energy and of very high intellect, Mr. LARRINAGA. It is already four years that he has been exerting himself to obtain a change, a reform. He has assiduously struggled. I have received his letters every week. As I read them I feel as though a cold wave would pervade my soul.

The intelligence and push of our Commissioner is powerless to make us advance one single step. It was necessary for us to send to Washington, as it was more direct, if possible, and we sent the speaker of our house of delegates. He went, talked, struggled, until he lost his health. He returned sick in health, and was only told that our régime was merely temporary. In spite of all this, I shall not advise my country to prepare for a fight with the machete and the gun in the mountains. I shall reach my speech to the point when I shall offer my own solution. I regret that at this very moment the ghost of Betances and Baldorioty, Acosta Celiand Vizcarrondo, and Ruiz Velvis, and a hundred other illustrious dead can not rise from their sepulchers and lend me their energies, so as not to feel discouragement and bend under the weight of despair. It is necessary that the Porto Rican people should defend themselves with a Spartan resolution against injustice. By submitting oneself it is not possible to reach a bright future. We must yet rally the remnants of our confidence, the last stitch of our faith; but before all we must resist with patriotic fortitude. We are small, but we shall be great; we are weak, but we shall be strong; if we unite shoulder to shoulder in this up-hill Calvary through which we go. Union will save us, and for that purpose and in order to save ourselves, the union of Porto Rico was formed, which stretches out around and opens her doors to all Porto Ricans.

I am talking politics, gentlemen; I wish, and I have a right, to speak politics. I am a member of a legislative body in which the people of Porto Rico placed its faith, and in which we are working with our faculties and with our decisions. We occupy a position in which politics is in its own domain, although we may be told that the function of this chamber is purely legislative. The cry of the people will be heard here in a more resounding manner. Let it be heard near and afar, gentleman; let it be known everywhere that the sons of this country, although compelled to suffer, at least know how to protest with dignity.

I now come, gentlemen, to the study of local political affairs, not so high but not less important than national politics. And all at once I stumble on the executive council. This is the greatest obstacle and, without any doubt, is the supreme hindrance to our insular aspirations. It is next to us and, by misfortune, is above us. There are bills here in our desks which are wise and practical. But, ah, gentlemen, these bills will never crystallize, they will never be presented to the House, because we know beforehand that it would be useless to develop them, to present them, to defend them, and to put them through in this house. They will then go to the other house, and there they will find the "requiescat in pace." We passed a hundred bills last year. This year there are already a hundred read by the clerk, and they will amount to 200 in the course of this legislature. Twelve or sixteen at the most will become law. This is the limit fixed by the executive council.

And do you know where all the work of the Porto Rican delegates can be found? You will find it in the wastebasket of the executive council. All this we must endure, and we have only the right to express our complaint, our indignation, in the face of such absurdity. Only one legitimate representation of the people there exists in Porto Rico, and this is the house of delegates. The house is a concentration, a condensation, of the will of the people. The house is the only one that has a right to speak and to vote for the country. The executive council is but a beaurocratic body; its members are the employees of President Roosevelt, imposed upon us without being heard by the organic act enacted for us by the Congress of the United States. In every country the lawmakers are the natives of the nation, or of the colony for which they enact laws. In Ireland, which is oppressed as we are, it is the Irish who make their laws; in Canada, more free than we are, it is the Canadians; in Budapest, under the despotic rule of Austria, it is the Hungarians who form the Hungarian Diet. In Porto Rico the members of the Porto Rican senate are Americans, and we are given the laws of Montana, of California.

The honor of establishing such a liberal and wise system belongs, gentlemen, to the American people, to the more democratic people and the more just people ever known in the annals of history. Now, a fact that has been often repeated, members of the executive council arrive here who, with astonishing lack of apprehension, legislate within twenty-four hours after their arrival for the people of Porto Rico without any knowledge of our language, without having looked at our laws, without having studied the wants and the customs of the country. In speaking of the members of the council I refer to the present as well as to the past ones. Both are the most ardent proclaimers of our meager preparation for self-government. And it becomes necessary to answer such a propaganda, not in the shadow of private and confidential reports, but in plain light and in a parliamentary session. It is necessary to prove in this legislative assembly that some are not prepared, but that such are not the natives of our country, nor their representatives. Please, gentlemen, lend me your attention. There are yet remaining thirty Republican independencies of the department of charities, health, and corrections, which is presided over by insular statesmen. The chief of the department had full authority to dismiss them before the 31st of December and appoint others in their places. He did not dismiss them, because their chief did not choose to stain by an abuse the law of civil service voted by both houses, and there are the thirty Republicans under a Unionist chief. Meanwhile, other chiefs of departments, other American chiefs, took advantage of the last moments of the expiring of the old law to arbitrarily dismiss employees.

And we are not prepared. It is only that we have respect for our own resolutions, while others have no respect for their own. They are the dominant ones; they fix the rule, and that rule is always favorable to them. They always have the favorable and we the unfavorable side of the question. And in this way things are going. But if in going in such a way, I can tell those gentlemen of the other House that they want that it is convenient for them to learn the lessons, the eloquent lessons of our local patriotists. There in the office of the consolidated departments a venerable Porto Rican, a man without a blot in his conduct, full of prestige on account of his great intellect and his prudence, competent and energetic, if there ever was one, is constantly working.

If that gentleman had dismissed many of his employees forty-eight hours before the civil-service law went in force, we would have heard a clamor and the commentaries of all the other gentlemen chiefs, affirming that Mr. Acuna was not prepared for the exercise of self-government. There is a gentleman now in the executive council whom I have not the pleasure to be acquainted with. It is reported that he is a great authority in pedagogy. It is affirmed that he devoted his whole life to public teaching, and in fact that he is a real instructor. And I have here before me, gentlemen, the programme for the examination of the rural teachers in Porto Rico. They are given out in English, without any Spanish translation, and it is asked that the teacher should answer on anatomy and physiology such questions as the following ones:

"Name of the principal organs of the human body and description of their functions.

"Which are veins, arteries, capillary. Which arteries have valves.

"Express opinion about tissues. Principal tissues of the human body.

"Describe the composition of the bones. Use of the same.

"Describe the nervous system. Discuss the influence of stimulants and narcotics."

Messrs. Delegates, these are very useful points of human knowledge. But the programmes ought to have been given to the candidates in Spanish. How can we ask a professor with $30 per month that he could be conversant with a foreign language and that without previous advice he should pass an examination on elemental physiology and anatomy? I am quite sure that the members of this house, excepting those who by their technical studies know thoroughly the scientific points, could not pass an examination; they could not become rural teachers with $30 per month.

I for one confess, my friends, that I could not, right now and without any preparation, take the risk of such a programme as this I am presenting to you, in which I see questions on hygiene, history, arithmetic, geography, and the Spanish language. [Laughter and applause through the house and the galleries.]

We now come to the great injustice, to a monstrous injustice. We have here in Porto Rico a department genuinely insular, and six other departments genuinely continental; a clerk, a director of sections, an employee whatsoever if he is an American, has a higher salary than the clerk, than the director, than the same employee with the identical work if he is a Porto Rican.

So that, in this also, the native inferiority is apparent as compared with the exotic superiority. And there is no such inferiority; such a superiority does not exist. The employees from here are as capable as the employees from abroad. And this obtains for the last ten years. I do admit that Americans may come to our office, although I think that they ought to be natives. What I do not admit is that Americans should have the higher salaries. This is unfair, it is abusive and offensive, Messrs. Delegates. I have the honor to be the chairman of the committee on ways and means; I here express frankly my opinion, which is not offhand, as the words of my speech are, but is the result of reflection and meditation. And I here tell you that I will take to the committee on ways and means this criterion which I now express before the house. [Applause.] I accept the cooperation, but not the superiority. I enthusiastically approve of the Americans building our system of roads with our money, but for the benefit of the island; I enthusiastically approve of the maintenance of our schools, with the enormous appropriations voted by this house, and for the progress of the country. In these two points they really carry out a good work, in which some deficiencies may be found, but which in the end are fruitful. I pay to them my tribute of sympathy, and I encourage them to go on.

But this house is not going to permit for a day longer that anybody should try to raise himself above us. There, in the North, it is very well for them to think themselves superior to the rest of the world; in fact, they are so. They give to humanity a gigantic impulse; they improve methods, they broaden ideas, they realize the progress, which nobody denies or tries to discuss, a progress for which they get recognition and for which they are glorified. No Porto Rican ever went, he will never go, and will never be permitted to go to dispute the supremacy in politics or administration to Wisconsin, Rhode Island, or Massachusetts. Here in our own country we do not permit anybody to stand above us. [Prolonged applause.] And the Americans themselves, if they are real Americans, after the fashion of Washington and Jefferson, will understand the attitude, which is not the result of pride or vanity, but which is the natural impulse of the heart and the serious promptings of reason.

The Porto Rican government ignores the opinion of the Porto Rican people, and ignores it not unconsciously, but in a deliberate and systematic manner. The affairs of the country are acted upon after consultation with some private friends, and not with a political organization. And thus during the American régime the same clique (camarilla) which worked in the Spanish time has been formed. Against that clique I always stood; against this new clique I stand to-day. In this country of ours there is a Republican party and a Unionist party. They are the only representatives of the 1,000,000 human beings inhabiting our cities and our country districts.

Now, gentlemen, the government ignores both of these factors, and only lends an ear to eight or ten favorites (they are no more than ten) which sometimes emerge from half obscurity. Nobody knows who they are, what they have accomplished, what is their meaning, or what they advise. And it is necessary to speak out very clearly; those men do not represent anything; they are nobody; their advice does not mean anything in the problems of our forgotten island and the problems of this poor island symbolically represented by a lamb.

It is for this reason, gentlemen, that I said before that the greatest error of the government consists in ignoring the organized factors of this community, factors that are organized not to oppose that government, but to help it if it goes on the right path and correctly. Porto Rico has a million inhabitants, five hundred thousand of which are males. Amongst those five hundred thousand, one hundred and fifty thousand voted at the polls from the one hundred and seventy thousand who had the right to do it at the last election of 1906, and I would like, gentlemen, to see also the Porto Rican women having a vote in our country. Out of this one hundred and fifty thousand one hundred and two thousand belonged to the Unionist party and fifty-one thousand to the Republican party. The government having at hand this powerful nucleus of public opinion, ignores it and slights it.

I wish that at this present moment a Republican minority would be occupying those seats. I would then appeal to the loyalty and sincerity of that minority, asking of them to declare clearly if my affirmations are not true. When my cordial opponents had the majority in this house, when they sent their representation to Washington, when they said they were in power they were no power at all. They were entirely ignored, as we were ignored; everything that represented here an active force was ignored; the country itself was ignored. I am a member of the central directing committee of the party of which I am proud to form a part. Many times did I discuss within that honorable committee this important question. Many times I visited the executive mansion, and I presented these problems to the governors of the island. Sometimes I left that palace with the conviction that the demand of the country was to be listened to. But afterwards I was convinced of the absolute incompatibility which existed, and that we should never reach a point of mutual transactions without very strenuous efforts. The Union party of Porto Rico made great sacrifices to come to a compromise with the government. The central directing committee maneuvered with dignified ability and encomiums and with tact to avoid a rupture. And it yet continues to work in that direction. It has continued to do so as long as the common dignity and decorum will permit it. I initiated and defended for two years such policies; I defended them in my speeches in the legislature in 1907; I yet stand for them. I believe that we should go with the government, with those governments which deserve it. We wish to be sincerely with the government, working to come to an understanding with established power; not with those governments if it is necessary to be unconditionally servile.

We can yield a good deal if a good deal is granted to us; we must be in a reciprocal attitude. In a word, we ought to pay the Government in the same coin that the Government pays us. [Applause.] I am of the opinion, and I advise, to place the independence of the insular house face to face with the independence of the insular government. We are not going systematically to oppose just as Machiavelicy and quietly we are combated. We are not going to refuse or to defeat the good laws of the executive council, as we are not going to approve or vote down the bad laws coming from that body. Our attitude is noble, but firm. We are not here to serve a power that mal-treats us, but to a people who elect us and sustain us. If that power stands in opposition to the country, we will be very sorry for him, and for us we will be sorry for Porto Rico. It is convenient for everyone concerned a harmonious tendency and good will. But it should not be asked of us that while cooperating to that harmony we should give it all, while others are not willing to give anything. We demand that the will of the people should be listened to; that within this régime mistaken and bad officials called to apply it should not go even further. We demand that in our country the prime interest shall be the interest of the country. I have already explained my opinion, gentlemen, an opinion which is personally my own and the one which I feel should be the opinion of the Union of Porto Rico.

I have not ascertained the opinion of the central directing committee. I speak from my own personal account, without involving anybody else in my declarations. If any glory or profit comes from this opinion, let them be for my party and for my country; if they develop hatred and rancors, let them be for myself alone. I calmly accept them, after the satisfaction I experience in expressing the bare facts, as I think is necessary to express them, and as they are not frequently expressed in our public life. [Prolonged applause.] This is, gentlemen, my issue and the local policy. After many bitter sacrifices, after a series of efforts to keep silence, I am convinced that such a silence is of no avail. Would that the policy in the highest sphere should change. If this happens, I shall always stand by those who do justice, with those who are convinced that tyranny, though veiled, is always odious and intolerable. The path to right doing is broad and luminous. The path to evil is narrow and dark. It is necessary to choose between the two. By the first one the Union will willingly go; by the second, those who will prefer it will go alone.

I end, gentlemen, by explaining my meaning in what relates to our relations to the national policy. Our duty is to ask for, to claim, to demand that the political status of Porto Rico should be determined upon—either with a conditional State within the community of the other States, either with a form of a frank autonomy with a community of the other American colonies. The task will be a hard one. The demand will have to be energetic and continuous. And if at the end we lose all hope, if at the end we exhaust our last effort without being heard and without our rights being recognized, then will rise in our consciences the fifth plank of the union of Porto Rico, and we shall call for independence of the island. It will then be heard—our constant hammering on the anvil, our constant energy, until the links of our servitude are broken to pieces. [Applause stifled the voice of the orator. The whole house applauds. The people in the gallaries stand on their seats, and the ovation lasts for several minutes.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Ten minutes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS].

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, I have just voted to return the Army appropriation bill to conference, and I would not vote for the present bill if I thought, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] has asserted, that it would add a dollar to the military expenses of this country. But it does not. It simply continues this regiment permanently instead of provisionally, and there are two excellent reasons why that should be done, reasons which I am sure appeal to gentlemen upon that side of the aisle just as strongly as to gentlemen upon this side.

The first is this: Certainly anyone who knows the island of Porto Rico knows that we have an island there containing over a million of people. Now, no matter how peaceable these people may be; no matter how pacific their disposition may be, they are a people of mercurial and somewhat uncertain temperament. Therefore to leave that island without any military force whatever, facing as it does the Panama Canal, I can not believe any of us will agree. But, second, and to my mind the more important reason, is this: Anyone who has been to Porto Rico and knows the real temper of the public mind there, knows there is not at present a friendly feeling for the American flag in Porto Rico, unjust and unwarranted as this feeling may be. Now, this regiment of Porto Rican soldiers, in which the Porto Rican people take the greatest pride, is a veritable school——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will in a moment. What I was going to say is that anyone who has been there knows this to be the fact, that this regiment of Porto Ricans is a nucleus of patriotism among the Porto Ricans toward this country. The officers and men are substantially all of them loyal Porto Ricans, and they inculcate throughout the island a spirit of loyalty to us and to our flag greater than any other one influence abroad in that island; so that I sincerely hope we will continue this regiment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the gentleman think that we could produce a feeling of patriotism toward America and love of the American flag very much less expensively and very much more rightly by simply giving to Porto Rico a delegate upon this floor?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not; and I shall embrace the very first opportunity upon this floor of stating why I do not.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, for one I am in favor of this bill, and I believe it ought to pass by the united Republican vote at least. It is a matter of a great deal of importance in the administration of affairs in the island of Porto Rico. The political status of that island in its relation with the United States has been considered as somewhat anomalous, and I know that natives of the island have felt somewhat uncertain about their rights under the American flag. This military organization is the only movable military organization in the island. It is the successor of that old Porto Rican regiment that is surrounded with such splendid traditions as was just described by the gentleman representing that island on this floor. As a matter of sentiment alone, as a token of recognition of the inhabitants of the island as citizens of the United States, as members of the great American family, it is worth all it costs.

But, Mr. Speaker, that island has a population of between a million and a million and half people. It is three or four days' travel from continental United States to the island; and if this regiment should be disbanded, that island, with its population, would be absolutely without any military protection. There is no national guard, as we call it, on the island. I undertake to say that there is no territory, no section, no locality, in the United States with a similar population that would be as far from a military organization as the island of Porto Rico would be if this regiment should be disbanded. For the purpose of aiding in the police protection of the island it is of great importance. It ought to be continued; it ought to be made permanent, I repeat, as a recognition of the Americanism of the people of the island. I believe in enacting other legislation that would recognize the inhabitants of the island of Porto Rico as full citizens of the United States in a practical and effectual manner.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Can the gentleman yield me any time?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has three minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Can you not yield me one minute or a minute and a half?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I want very briefly to explain the situation, as far as this regiment is concerned, in addition to what I have already said. I do not think the Porto Rican regiment will be disbanded if we do not pass this bill. We have already provided in the appropriation bill for the recommissioning of the officers for terms of four years. We have provided for the continuance, so far as the expense is concerned, of the regiment, and to the extent of this bill, in giving this additional status to the officers, giving recognition of the right to retired pay.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: You admit that if this bill does not pass it will prevent addition to the personnel of the officers of the Army?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. On the retired list.

Mr. SLAYDEN. On the retired list.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It does not make any addition to the officers on the active list, but it does make an addition to the retired list when the time comes for them to retire. And whether the gentleman from Texas or myself shall be in Congress when they reach the age of 64 years, Congress will pass special acts to put them on the retired list, in my opinion, as an act of justice. But this regiment is a great educational factor to the people of Porto Rico. We provide that there shall be only one term of enlistment. When that term expires the men are scattered over the island; and I claim that that is one of the most efficient means of cultivating a love for the United States and its flag that you could have in Porto Rico.

I do not agree with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] when he says that he wants the Democratic party not to vote for one additional man in the Army of the United States. So far as I am concerned—and I speak for myself only in this—I want the Republicans to vote for any man or any measure that is necessary for the dignity, safety, and prosperity of the United States of America. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HAY. The gentleman does not want to put me in a false position——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not want my party to be afraid of voting for what is right, with the idea that if they do somebody may criticise them on the stump this fall. I have fought this battle out in my State, and I am known there as a friend of the Army, and the people I represent are willing to do whatever is necessary to safeguard the rights and interests and dignity and prosperity of the country.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman can not make me say I would not vote for anything that is necessary. I never said anything of that sort.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I understood you to say you did not want your party to go on record in favor of an increase of any officers of the Army.

Mr. HAY. Because I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Well, I think it is, and therefore I hope our side will all vote for it. But this does not increase the number of officers a single man. It does increase the retired list.

Mr. HAY. Yes; but the gentleman will admit that the Comptroller of the Currency will probably not pay these officers unless this bill is passed.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That has been construed, and the Comptroller will pay just as long as Congress appropriates for them.

Mr. HAY. Not when the law provides that they shall go out of office on the 30th of June.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. As long as Congress appropriates they will be paid. I think there is absolutely nothing in that, and as long as conditions are as we believe them to be now, Congress will appropriate separately for them. There is nothing in the question of expense except the ultimate expense of the retired list. I want to say that every one of these line officers who serves until he is 64 years of age, and every one of them who serves until he becomes disabled in the line of duty will be placed on the retired list by the Congress of the United States whether you pass this bill or not.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All time has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the committee amendments.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 129, nays 80, answered "present" 4, not voting 174, as follows:

For the balance of the day:

Mr. HEPBURN with Mr. RICHARDSON.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

BOARD OF MANAGERS OF THE NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution No. 178, for appointment of members of Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That Thomas J. Henderson, of Illinois; Walter P. Brownlow, of Tennessee; Edwin P. Hammond, of Indiana, and Joseph S. Smith, of Maine, be, and the same are hereby, appointed as members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States—Gen. Thomas J. Henderson to succeed himself, his term of service having expired April 21, 1908; Col. Walter P. Brownlow to succeed himself, his term of service having expired April 21, 1908; Col. Edwin P. Hammond to succeed himself, his term of service having expired April 21, 1908, and Gen. Joseph S. Smith to succeed Gen. J. Marshall Brown, whose term of service would have expired on April 21, 1908, but who died on July 20, 1907.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule a second is considered as ordered. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to twenty minutes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in this resolution except what is made necessary by the present laws governing the National Homes. There are twelve members of of the Board of Managers of National Homes, and the offices of four expire every two years. This Congress has not filled these new places as promptly as they should have been, for the reason that it seemed impossible to get an opportunity to put in a resolution like this, which has always been passed heretofore by unanimous consent. I reserve the balance of my time, for I have no desire to take the time of the House to discuss it any further.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a moment ago when the question of the Porto Rican regiment was up, I desired to say a few words, but the time on this side was exhausted and the time on that side was needed.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], in the course of his remarks, said that this regiment ought to be kept up in Porto Rico for the purpose of "teaching Americanism" there. It is to that remark that I desire to address myself.

Porto Rico has become a part of the United States. It is going to remain permanently a part of the United States. Unlike the Philippines, very much unlike in every respect, it is destined to be for all time a part of our country. It is very important that Americanism should be taught in Porto Rico, that the people there should learn to love American institutions and to feel a fellowship with American citizens. The right way to teach them the lesson is not to give them a regiment, the highest office in which that can be held by a native Porto Rican is a captaincy. To expect to gain them this way is to take them for fools or children. The right way to give them an education in Americanism is not to educate them to the sound of the fife and drum, to military parade, "the pomp and circumstance of glorious war," and all that, but to realize now and to act upon the realization that the Porto Rican people ought to be made Americans whether they speak a foreign language or not, and the right way to make Americans of them, to teach them Americanism and a love of American institutions, is to give them American institutions. Nobody can have a taste for a thing unless he first have a taste of that thing.

Porto Rico ought to be made a Territory of the United States; it ought to have a Delegate upon this floor. We ought no longer to keep the people of Porto Rico in the status where they are now, where they are adjudged to be neither foreigners nor citizens, neither fish, flesh, nor fowl; something like Mohammed's coffin, hanging unfixed between high heaven and the earth—nowhere a fixed status.

If the Porto Ricans are to honor and love the flag which hangs above your head, they are to love it because that flag benefits them, brings brotherhood and fraternity to them, brings American institutions to them, and the only way in which American institutions can be brought to them is in the manner I have stated.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the gentleman doubt that the flag has brought benefits of all sorts to them?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will answer the question which the gentleman has asked, although he has asked it without permission to interrupt. I do not doubt that the flag has brought benefits to them, but I do deny, and the gentleman himself will not assert, that the flag has brought all the benefits to them that the flag ought to have carried. The flag can not carry all the benefits that it ought to carry until these people are recognized as part and parcel of the body politic of the United States and given the right that the people of Arizona and New Mexico are given. Their case is not like that of the Filipinos. We hope some day to be rid of the Filipinos, because they are an alien and nonassimilable race. These Porto Ricans are not nonassimilable, and there is no reason why they should not become just as all American citizens are in everything except in the language which they speak, and perhaps gradually they will even assume the English language.

I tell you now that if you keep them in the status in which you have them now, within ten years from now there will not only be, as the gentleman says there is now, an "unfriendly feeling toward Americans in Porto Rico," but there will be a hatred equal to that which the Irish feel for England. You have not even given them as much recognition as England has given Ireland. The Irishman is nearer a fellow-subject of the Englishman than the Porto Rican is a fellow-citizen of the American today. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You can not teach men to love you by providing them with a regiment, with the innuendo "If you are not good, the regiment is here to make you good." You can make men a part of your national household only in one way, and that is to admit them into your household. You can not make people love the family by treating them as stepchildren. You have got to treat them as children.

And one of the things that history will charge up against this Republican party is the fact that instead of teaching these people to love American institutions, you are teaching them to hate them and Americans with them. They came into the Union not unwillingly, they welcomed our American troops; "tossing their caps high in air," with huzzas when the American troops landed. Now, already it is confessed upon the floor by one of your own body that "an unfriendly feeling toward America is general" over the island. Whose fault is it except our own?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, I can answer the question if the gentleman will give me an opportunity.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When I say our own, I mean those in control of the country. I did not hear the gentleman, and if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS] has a question to propound, if he would pursue the usual course I would then be able to understand his question. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I say the gentleman pointed at me and asked a question and I am willing to answer it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did ask the gentleman no question. What question did I, in his opinion, ask the gentleman?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The question is as to why the Porto Rican people are not more friendly to the flag.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield to the gentleman to tell me why.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The reply is in one word. It is due to the peculiar character of the Porto Ricans.

Mr. LARRINAGA. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield further. There is one thing that I think I know. There are not many things in this world that I am cocksure about, but one thing I think I know. I think I know that human nature in the Caucasian race, in the white race, is pretty much the same all over this world. I have known it upon the banks of the Tiber, the Thames, the Seine, the Avon, the Rhine, the Mississippi, the Ohio. The white man's human nature is nearly everywhere the same, just as the Chinaman's human nature is, whether he is in Hongkong or New York, and the negro's human nature, whether he is in Timbuctoo or New Orleans. They differ on broad racial lines, but within racial lines men are subject to identical motives and influences. There is no white man living upon the surface of this earth that can be made to love another white man and honor him by fear, by arrogance, by assumption of superiority, or except in one way, and that is by receiving justice and respect and honor.

And whenever you give the Porto Ricans that they will love your institutions and love you, and as long as you keep them as you are trying to keep them now, in a sort of unconscious arrogance of superiority, as inferiors to yourselves, they not only will necessarily distrust you, but that distrust will grow. They not only, necessarily, will be unfriendly to you, but that unfriendliness will gradually become hostility, enmity, deep-seated hatred, almost ineradicable. Porto Rico is represented here by a Commissioner. What man upon the floor who knows him does not honor him just as much as any other man here? [Applause.] Why should he not have the same right upon this floor that a Delegate from Arizona or New Mexico has? Why should you pronounce beforehand that the white people of Porto Rico are unfit to be citizens of an American Territory? I am not speaking of statehood for them, because they have, perhaps, neither the population nor the wealth nor as yet the political training, but they have at least the right to be admitted into the preparatory school of the great college of Americanism, the great college of American patriotism—a Territorial condition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

All that I said that has any reference to the gentleman from Ohio was this, that he had himself admitted that there was in Porto Rico a feeling of unfriendliness toward America. I myself do not know whether his admission be founded on fact or not, because it is my misfortune not to know the Porto Ricans, never to have been among them. But if it be true—and for the sake of argument I am admitting it to be true—then I deny that it can grow out of any "peculiarity" of the white people of Porto Rico. I deny that it can grow out of anything except that rock-bottom fact, which is based in all white human nature, that "you that have friends must show yourselves friendly." Solomon said that in a little bit different phraseology, and it is true and has been true always.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. When you are dealing with a race that is alien and nonassimilable, a race whose blood fraternity with yourselves you can not admit—and all fraternity is based upon actual or potential relationship in lawful wedlock—lawful blood kinship—then you have a different problem altogether. There fraternity is impossible, there assimilability is impossible, there common and equal citizenship is impossible, there genuine equality is impossible, because genuine equality is based upon genuine fraternity. But when you are dealing with a people with whom you can assimilate, a people of your own race—a white people—then all you have to do, if you want them to love the household, is to admit them into the household as children and not as stepchildren.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to state to the gentleman I have introduced a bill in this House to give citizenship to the people of Porto Rico; what has the gentleman done?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from Mississippi welcomes the knowledge of the fact hitherto not known to him that the gentleman from Ohio has introduced such a bill. Not only the gentleman from Mississippi but his party have been standing upon the Committee on Insular Affairs and the Committee on Territories and elsewhere for making a Territory of Porto Rico and giving it a Delegate upon this floor. In the Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth and this Congress we have stood without division for it. We are opposed to crown colonialism in Porto Rico.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not wish to mention the party question, but the gentleman from Ohio has forced it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin always.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I desire to inform the gentleman from Ohio that the Committee on Insular Affairs in the last Congress unanimously reported a bill to confer citizenship upon the people of Porto Rico, and that in the present Congress it reported such a bill, and it is now upon the Calendar.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And can not obtain a hearing.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I did not say that. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did, and I repeat, "and can not get a hearing."

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit, I will say, if that is the case, he is more entitled to indulge in glittering generalities upon Porto Rico than the gentleman from Mississippi——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin has not the floor; the gentleman from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not dealing in glittering generalities, but am thrusting home a concrete instance of manifest right.

Mr. Speaker, I thought it well to say thus much, because I did not have the opportunity at the right time to say it, as my desire to interrupt could not be granted, so that what I said, or attempted interrogatively to interject in the matter, was "left up in the air" and unexplained. I wanted, when I attempted to interrupt the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Iowa, to say that if we really desire to "educate" the people of Porto Rico in "Americanism" and the appreciation and love of Americanism, the right way is to educate them in the primary school, in the preparatory school, the Territorial school, and then in the course of time they will be Americans all right. I am not afraid of white men anywhere undertaking the duties of American citizenship after primary training, but you had better begin now and give them the primary training. But "regiments" do not do it; drums and trumpets do not do it; epaulets do not do it, and the idle pomp and circumstance of holiday warfare do not do it; the turning of a national-guard regiment into a Regular Army regiment, with a retired list, does not do it. All that is idleness and puerility. It may appeal to the vanity of individual Porto Ricans here and there, but it does not reach the heart of Porto Rico, and that is what I want to reach. I now yield back whatever time I may have remaining to the gentleman from Alabama. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to rest the joint resolution which is now before the House to elect managers of the National Home on the argument made by the gentleman from Mississippi. [Applause.] I now surrender all of my time and I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, pending that I move that the House do now take a recess until to-morrow at 11.30 a. m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending that the gentleman from New York moves that the House now take a recess until 11.30 to-morrow morning.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—ayes, 137, nays 77, answered "present" 9, not voting 164, as follows:

AMENDMENT TO OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. DICK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN GEORGIA AND FLORIDA.

Mr. BACON. I desire to ask an order of the Senate to print certain documents. There are certain ancient documents and reports relating to the boundary between the State of Georgia and the Territory of Florida, the location and marking of the same, which are almost entirely out of print. I will enumerate them:

Senate Document No. 55, Twentieth Congress, first session;
Senate Document No. 204, Twentieth Congress, first session;
House Document No. 50, Twentieth Congress, second session;
Senate Report No. 17, Twenty-first Congress, first session;
House Document No. 152, Twenty-third Congress, first session;
Senate Document No. 96, Twenty-ninth Congress, first session;
Senate Document No. 133, Twenty-ninth Congress, first session; and House Document No. 43, Twenty-second Congress, first session.

It will be readily recognized from the Congresses in which those documents and reports were made that they were very early in history of the Government. It is important that they should be preserved. I ask that all may be printed as one Senate document.

There being no objection, the order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the ancient documents and reports relating to the boundary between the State of Georgia and the Territory of Florida, the location and marking of the same,
Senate Document No. 55, Twentieth Congress, first session;
House Document No. 204, Twentieth Congress, first session;
House Document No. 50, Twentieth Congress, second session;
Senate Report No. 17, Twenty-first Congress, first session;
House Document No. 152, Twenty-third Congress, first session;
Senate Document No. 96, Twenty-ninth Congress, first session;
Senate Document No. 133, Twenty-ninth Congress, first session; and House Document No. 43, Twenty-second Congress, first session, be printed.

STATE CONTROL OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. BACON. As a part of the minority of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate I made not a report, but an expression of views in regard to legislation to regulate interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors. It was a part of Report No. 499, known as part 5. The edition published has been nearly exhausted, and I ask that 1,000 copies of it may be again printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 18618. An act fixing the status of the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20345) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LANDIS, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. HOWARD managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the bill (H. R. 17288) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20345) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice-President appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. CLAY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

MOTHERS' DAY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. BURKETT, as follows:

Resolved, That Sunday, May 10, 1908, be recognized as Mothers' Day, and that it be observed as such by the members and officers and employees of the United States Senate wearing a white flower in honor of their mothers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. KEAN. I move to strike out all after the word "Resolved" and to insert the Fifth Commandment: "Honor thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

Mr. CLAPP. I move to amend the resolution by inserting after the words "nineteen hundred and eight" the words "and annually thereafter," so that it will read: "That Sunday, May 10, 1908, and annually thereafter be recognized," and so forth.

Mr. BURKETT. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that if he is going to add that it should read "and the second Sunday in May, annually thereafter."

Mr. CLAPP. I accept the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be read as modified.

The SECRETARY. Add after the words "nineteen hundred and eight" the words "and the second Sunday in May annually thereafter."

Mr. TELLER. I understood that the Senator from New Jersey had an amendment pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota is to perfect the text of the resolution.

Mr. TELLER. It may be a substitute, but I think I should rather vote on the proposition of the Senator from New Jersey.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator will have that opportunity after the original text is perfected.

Mr. TELLER. If we have to vote, I would rather vote on striking out and inserting something else. I do not think this amendment is in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota is in order, as it is to perfect the text.

Mr. FULTON. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I should like to say just a word before that motion is voted on. I introduced this resolution upon the request of some Young Men's Christian Association workers. As I understand it, the Young Men's Christian Association are trying to establish a Mothers' Day. The Young Men's Christian Association is organized for the boys of the cities who come from the country all over. They gather them into the Young Men's Christian Association and try to do them good. On Sundays, especially, they gather together, and they do great good. Perhaps the most good that the Young Men's Christian Association does is the gathering together of the boys for social intercourse and religious teaching that come from the country to the cities. They are away from home and among strangers. This idea of a Mothers' Day has been started by some of the most prominent workers. It is believed it will get the boys together and make them think of home and mother and the surroundings there, and that it would be a good thing to establish Mothers' Day.

I have received several telegrams from Young Men's Christian Association workers, asking the Senate to recognize this day this year. They did not ask us to go any further. But I have not any objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota. I did not make it a joint resolution or ask to make it a law. I simply wanted to pass a resolution through here so as to give it somewhat of a standing, and let it be known that the members of the Senate of the United States could afford to set aside one day in honor of their mothers.

I did not expect that a single objection would be offered when I introduced the resolution, because I consulted with some older in service here as to the propriety of it, and so far as I have yet heard no one has objected to the propriety of the resolution. It is not attempted to make a holiday. I have not attempted to make it perpetual. I simply intended to give some standing to this day, which some of the Young Men's Christian Association organizations of the country are trying to recognize.

I think the Senators will admit that there is no sentiment which would bring home to the boys a sweeter and a better thought than to devote one day in honor of their mothers. They are away from home; they are in the cities; they are among strangers, and it does seem to me that the Senate can afford to pass through this resolution and put its seal of approval in behalf of this movement.

I have been somewhat surprised that there has been a substitute offered for the resolution, and objections made to it, and light made of it. If any Senator will stand up here and say that this is an improper resolution for the Senate to pass, or if they will stand up here and criticise it in any way, that is all right. But it is not right to offer as a substitute for the resolution one of the Commandments, a thing that we are not asked to pass, that has nothing whatsoever to do with this day, nor the motive that is behind this day. I submit that the Senate can afford to send out to the country that we think—as a matter of sentiment only, and that is all it is—this idea a good one, and that we indorse the Young Men's Christian Association workers of the country in trying to bring home to the boys from the country who are in the cities and among strangers the thought of the old homes that they left and the mothers who gave them birth.

Mr. FULTON obtained the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon an interruption——

Mr. FULTON. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. I wish simply to say to the Senator from Nebraska that while this measure is perhaps somewhat unique I am heartily in sympathy with it.

Mr. BURKETT. I understand the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. I think it would be a wise thing to do, and if the Senator felt that my amendment in any manner imperils the resolution I certainly should withdraw it.

Mr. BURKETT. I have not had any such feeling, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. FULTON. I have not made the motion I did—to refer the resolution to a committee—out of levity or any disposition to belittle the thought suggested by the resolution. Nor is it necessary to go into any argument to show our appreciation of the work the Young Men's Christian Association of this country are doing for the boys and the young men of the country.

Mr. BURKETT. The Senator said he did not have any intention, in making the motion, to defeat the resolution. Of course it does defeat it, because to-morrow is the Sunday designated, and if the resolution is referred to the committee that ends it, of course, so far as action by the Senate is concerned.

Mr. FULTON. It may end it for the present and it may not. That depends on how early a report is made.

I will say to the Senator very frankly that I am, myself, opposed to the resolution unless it shall receive a little more consideration through a committee and at the hands of the Senate. We all appreciate the mothers of the land and we stand ready at any time to do anything and everything in honor of them. But it is not necessary, Mr. President, in order to show our appreciation of the mothers of this country to set aside some special day dedicated to them or to their names and to their memories.

There are some thoughts that are so great and so sacred, Mr. President, that they are belittled by movements of this character. If we are going to take up this line of legislative action I think we should not stop by drawing the distinctions. I think we should have a "fathers' day." Then I have a great respect for my grandfather and I think we should have a "grandfathers' day." Then, perhaps, we ought to bring in our cousins, and our aunts, or uncles. I can see no reason why we should make these invidious distinctions. At least, Mr. President, I think the matter should be taken under consideration and a committee should determine it. Everybody would agree that we should have a "mother-in-law day." [Laughter.] I am sure the committee would report it. I want them to consider very solemnly in connection with it, everything. I think the resolution should unquestionably go to a committee to receive that careful thought and consideration which the vastness and importance of the subject require.

Mr. BURKETT. The Senator admits that he means to kill the resolution. Doubtless it will kill it if it is referred to the committee. I think we understand the motive.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as it was upon my objection that the resolution went over yesterday, I desire to say just a word.

It was a surprise to me when it was read. I had never heard of any movement in behalf of a "Mother's Day" in the District of Columbia or in the country at large, nor have I yet heard of it except through the Senator from Nebraska. He says he has received a telegram or telegrams concerning this matter. I am in pretty close touch with the Young Men's Christian Associations, especially in a financial way, and I have a great many friends in those associations. We have a very fine association in my own city, and the public-spirited citizens of that little city have built a beautiful home for that association. But they have never suggested this to me, and I never heard of it until yesterday.

Mr. President, I think this is an unnecessary resolution. I do not need to wear a white flower to remember my mother, although she left me when I was a lad. I do not think the employees of the Senate need to wear a white flower to-morrow to remind them of the fact that they had mothers who cared for them and loved them, and whose memory, if they have passed away, is embalmed in their hearts.

I can not see any necessity for the resolution. As I entered the Chamber a moment ago I heard the Senator from Oregon make a suggestion relating to our fathers, which appealed to me. If we are to wear a white flower to remind us of the fact that we had good mothers, some of us would want to wear a white flower to remind us of the fathers who cared for us when we needed care and protection.

Feeling that way, Mr. President, respecting my mother's memory and remembering the tender care she gave me, I should feel it was almost a reproach to lay a burden upon me even by way of suggestion that her memory could only be kept green by some outward demonstration on Sunday, May 10.

If this movement is as serious as the Senator from Nebraska seems to suggest, we will hear of it, and if it is taken up in earnest by the Young Men's Christian Association, or any other association of that kind, in due time they will tell us why they want it and what is the necessity for it, and we can give it more serious consideration than we can possibly give it to-day.

For the reasons I have suggested, Mr. President, I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Oregon to send this matter to a committee of the Senate for its consideration and report.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire has expressed quite fully my views upon this subject. It seems to me it is trifling with the things that we come here to perform. What benefit can anybody derive from the Senate declaring that on the 10th of May this year and hereafter there shall be a mothers' day and those who have not forgotten their mothers will wear a white flower?

I am like the Senator from New Hampshire. I do not need anything of that kind. Every day, Mr. President, with me is a mother's day. I do not forget her, not even in the busy affairs of life. I remember her every day and what I owe to her. It seems to me to be trifling with that holy affection of our mothers that we should think it necessary to have a day.

It grates upon my feelings, Mr. President. I would not want to say anything offensive to the Senator from Nebraska, who introduced the resolution, or those backing it——

Mr. BURKETT. Say anything you want to say. Do not hesitate.

Mr. TELLER. I have never heard from any of the organizations of which the Senator speaks even a suggestion, and if I had I should have regarded it as absolutely absurd.

Mr. President, I think perhaps the best way is to send the resolution to a committee. If the committee differ with the Senator from New Hampshire, the Senator from Oregon, and myself, they can present the matter and we can consider it. If I could see any good that would come of it, I would not object to it. If I thought it would keep their mothers in the memory of men and be a stimulant to them to remember their mothers and remember their services and to be better men, I would not object to it. I do not believe that the man who forgets his mother will have it called to his mind because he sees somebody wearing a white ribbon or a white flower. I believe it is to be a white flower.

Mr. President, I am sorry that the resolution has been offered and I would vote, if necessary to vote on the resolution, for the amendment the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] offered. I believe it to be our duty to honor our fathers and our mothers. I do not see, if we are going to have a mothers' day, why we should not have a fathers' day. Dear as my mother is to me, she is not dearer to me than my father. Much as she may have had to do with the formation of my character, so had my father. I am not going to declare that one of my parents is entitled to consideration that the other is not. And, as the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] has said, some of us have grandfathers that we have high respect for.

Mr. President, if I can say it, and the Senator says I may, it seems to me to be puerile.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not agree with either the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] or the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. It may be true, and doubtless is true, that the resolution was unnecessary, but having been offered, it seems to me that it would be the graceful thing for the Senate to treat it with respect and to act upon it favorably.

The Senator asked why should there be any invidious distinction. I think, sir, I may safely say that an invidious distinction in favor of the mothers of the land is not one entitled to condemnation. They occupy a very peculiar relation, a tender relation, which no other approaches. These young men being scattered as they are from their homes in different localities, the time having been short since they left their mothers' guardianship and care, I can very readily understand how they should have originated a movement of this kind, and it does them very great honor.

The Senators say it is not necessary that any day should be set apart in order that they should remember their mothers. Mr. President, that is not the ground upon which days are set apart in honor of any event or of any individual. National holidays are declared not to guard the people against the danger of forgetting great events like the Fourth of July or other great anniversaries. People of the United States wear a red rose on a certain day in honor of President McKinley. Does anybody say it is done in order that he may not be forgotten? And so I might enumerate other things. It is not to guard people against the danger of forgetting that these symbols are worn, but it is the gratification it gives to give an outward expression and manifestation of an inward sentiment and emotion that does honor to the man who conceives its use, and who wears it, and is proud of it.

Mr. President, unfortunately for me, a white rose will not bring back to me the memory of my mother, for I have no memory of her. I was not a year old when she died. But I would wear it, Mr. President, not because of danger that I would forget I owe to her my life, but because I would be glad of the opportunity to manifest the fact that although I do not remember ever to have seen her, I have always loved her memory.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, however I might vote upon the resolution itself, it seems to me that the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] should not prevail. If it is the desire of Senators to kill the resolution and vote against it, why not do it directly? The reference of a bill or a resolution to a committee is for a very different purpose and a very clear reason. It is that where the machinery of a law needs to be carefully considered, where its workability needs to be assured and its wisdom determined, a committee shall give it the attention of its thought and its correction.

But this resolution involves no law. It concerns no matter of administration. Its reference is of course, as the Senator from Nebraska so truthfully said, nothing more than to kill the resolution in that way. So there can be no possible good in referring it to a committee. I should think that the franker way, if you wish to reject it, would be to vote against it directly. To refer it is to assassinate it in an indirect manner.

Of course all of us know perfectly well that the consideration of a committee is not necessary on a question of this kind to advise the Senate either as to its wisdom or as to the administration of any law or as to the perfection of any law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator tell me why referring the resolution to a committee would necessarily kill it, if the committee were in favor of it? Suppose we would make it the 15th instead of the 10th? I do not understand that there is any particular reason for the 10th rather than the 15th or any other day.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There are two questions involved. The first is because the Senator knows that a matter of this kind once referred to a committee is disposed of for good.

Mr. BURKETT. The day has been already set as the 10th, I will say to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. However, it does not get out of the committee as a matter of fact and of practice.

Now, as to the second question the Senator asked, the Senator says that the committee might say the 15th instead of the 10th. With all possible deference to the Senator it occurs to me that that is hardly a worthy argument. Of course it does not require the deliberations of a committee to determine whether the 10th or the 15th shall be the date.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator does not understand me. Of course we undertand that this being the 9th, and the 10th being fixed, the committee could hardly consider it in time to make it effective for to-morrow if they gave it any consideration, but they could make it effective at some future date. For that reason it does not seem to me it necessarily follows that the committee would treat it with disrespect or treat it in any way except in that fairness with which the Judiciary Committee treats all subjects.

Mr. BURKETT. I should like to answer the Senator by saying that the 10th has been set by the movement. The movement, whatever it is, has set the 10th of May. So if we are going to recognize this year's Mothers' Day, we must recognize the 10th, and we could not recognize the 15th.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So that is another rather conclusive reason. If it were a question which involved the necessary deliberation of a committee, of course, like any other Senator, I should vote for the motion to refer it. But I think we will all recognize that this is simply a way of disposing of the resolution. I think it would be far better for the Senate frankly to meet the question. It is not a grave question, as the Senator from Nebraska so well said; it is a question of sentiment. Of course, questions of sentiment have been the questions that have moved the world. Questions of sentiment founded this Government and underlie all broad human movements.

I did not rise to speak to the resolution at all, but merely to this method of its disposition.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should ask to be excused from voting upon a resolution of this kind. The Senator from Indiana has compared the sentiment involved in the resolution with that of the sacrament of the church. We do not believe in outward symbols——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator will permit me, he misunderstood my words. I was merely answering the argument made here, that it was not necessary to recall anything by a symbol, and I pointed out that that is the reason and philosophy of sacraments. I merely used that as an illustration to answer that point.

Mr. HEYBURN. The religious creed which I profess does not believe it necessary to make demonstrations of sentiments of this class. We deem them proper to be confined to the individual. We believe that they belong sacredly within the ties of the home, and we do not recognize either the necessity or the propriety of making public demonstration of those sentiments. I should feel constrained not to vote upon a resolution of this kind. It is not because we are lacking in the highest appreciation of the sentiment that is undertaken to be expressed by the resolution. There are no people in the world in whose hearts a sentiment is more deeply and more sacredly fixed than in those and in the words of those who believe in the silent worship of their Creator, without manifestation for the benefit or enlightment of the outer world.

Mr. President, I think this is inappropriate legislation. It is not a proper subject for legislation. We are here to legislate, and this is in no sense of the word a proper subject for legislation. The question of the home sentiment, the sentiment that exists between the parent and the child, are too sacred to be made the subject of bandying words or to be subjected to the rules of parliamentary practice and parliamentary law.

We need to set aside no day to remind us of these sacred relations that belong within the sacred precincts of every person's conscience and the most sacred recesses of their hearts. We need no such legislation. It is not a proper subject for legislation. I would not vote against it, out of regard for the feelings of others. I would not vote for it, because I do not believe in an outward expression of those sentiments or a sentiment belonging to that class. Therefore I say that I should not vote upon a resolution of this kind, either to refer it to a committee or to adopt it or to reject it. I would not want it to be thought for a moment that by my not expressing an opinion I was not in thorough sympathy with the sentiment which actuates the distinguished Senator who presented this resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary. [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the demand for the yeas and nays seconded? In the opinion of the Chair a sufficient number of Senators have not seconded the demand, and the yeas and nays are not ordered.

Mr. BURKETT. I call for a division, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A division is asked for.

Mr. DANIEL. Is this on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A division is asked on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 29, noes 18.

Mr. BURKETT. What is the vote, Mr. President?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am of the impression that the question was not quite understood by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will again put the question.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to have the vote again taken after an announcement of the Chair as to precisely what is the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON], that the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question being again put, there were, on a division—ayes 33, noes 14.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to refer is agreed to.

Mr. BURKETT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. The yeas and nays have been refused.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request for the yeas and nays has been denied.

Mr. BURKETT. I ask for a division on the question of taking the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There has been a division, and the Chair has announced the result.

Mr. BURKETT. I think the Chair misunderstood me. I asked for a division on the question of taking the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is never done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There can be no division upon the question of ordering the yeas and nays, as requested by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BURKETT. I now move that the Judiciary Committee be instructed to report forthwith on this resolution.

Mr. TELLER. I move to lay the motion on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] moves that the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report forthwith upon the resolution, and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] moves to lay the motion of the Senator from Nebraska on the table.

Mr. BURKETT. Is that debatable, Mr. President?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No; the motion to lay on the table is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado to lay the motion of the Senator from Nebraska on the table. [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it, and the motion is agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, we came here at 11 o'clock this morning because it was supposed that there was some important business to be transacted by the Senate. Some of us came here at some inconvenience, having other things to attend to. We have practically wasted this morning, Mr. President, on a matter which never ought to have come before the Senate.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I invited the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to make any personal attack on me he might wish to make when he made his suggestion a while ago. He did not do it then, though he might have stated his objections to the resolution at that particular time.

I want to say to the Senator from Colorado that we might as well afford to spend twenty minutes on a question of this kind as to have spent the days and days that have been occupied in the Senate listening to the wrangling about something or other of less consequence out in that particular section of the country from which the Senator comes.

I have no apology, I will say to the Senator, for offering this resolution, and, in my opinion, we should have had a vote upon it by yeas and nays. In my opinion, Senators will see the time when they will regret that they have not voted for this resolution.

The Senator objected because it was not proper that we should pay any attention to a matter of this concern, yet I have seen the Senate spend hours and hours and spend money in building a monument to some particular man in recognition of some particular service, not to celebrate what he had done, but to inculcate in the minds and to burn into the memories of the young people of this land the things which that man had done for the glory and welfare of his country. And it does seem to me that this Senate could well have afforded to have passed a resolution saying that we join in that splendid sentiment that the Young Men's Christian Association people of this country are trying to establish, and set aside one day when we shall recall the mothers who gave us birth. It was not asking very much; it would not have taken very much time; and yet we have refused to recognize a little movement on the part of these young men who are trying to do good in the world, which, in my opinion, would do more good for the young men, if he could have this day observed in spirit and in truth throughout the country, than all the monuments that we have erected here in the years that have passed.

I recall, sir, in this Senate at this session two or three occasions when we have appropriated money to build monuments to celebrate some particular event or the life of some particular man. Why did we do it? Not because we would not think about those men if we did not, not because we could make those men any greater in history, but we have done it, sir, to call to the minds of the people what such men stood for, what they lived for, and what they died for, and that is all there was in this resolution. It was simply a matter of sentiment, simply a statement to the wide, wide world that United States Senators though we were, we still looked fondly back to our dear old mothers, whose memory we honor, and that we are willing on one day in the year to join with the Christian people of the country in wearing a white flower in memory and in honor of those mothers.

Sir, it is one of the proudest recollections of my life, that, since I have been away from home—I was nearly 17 years old when I left home—I have never missed one Sunday in all those years writing a letter to my dear old mother. She would have lived as long without it; perhaps she might have thought just as much of me without it; and I did not have to do it to make me love her; but, sir, I never would have thought as much of myself if I had not done that thing; and it would be a proud thing for every man in this Senate if we had voted this resolution through, and said to the world, to those boys that have gone out into the world from their homes, "Boys, it is proper, it is appropriate; it is fitting for you to go into the Young Men's Christian Association assemblies as well as into your churches one day in the year, and let your memories go back to the days when you were at home with mother." It is the sweetest and tenderest thought that ever comes to anyone. It is the most pathetic thing. There is not another thought, there is not another sentiment in the world that brings a man as close to his duty to his fellow-man and to his duty to his God as in those moments when he is thinking of that dear old mother; I can not sit here and have the Senator from Colorado get up and say that I am puerile and accuse me of wasting time, when I have taken up so little of the time of this Senate—I ought to take but little time of the Senate, I realize that I am a new member, and I want to sit and listen to the wisdom of the older members—but after we have spent the days and days we have in trying to rip up a particular part of the administration of the affairs of this country with no hope of success, it seems to me it is with poor grace to say that we can not afford to give twenty minutes to the thousands and thousands of boys there are in this country and to the honor and the memory of all the mothers that have ever lived; we do not do it for ourselves, we do not do it alone for the mothers, but for the sake of those boys that are out in the world alone. We could well afford to pass this resolution, and we could well afford to devote this time we have devoted to it if, for no other reason, than to call the attention of the country to it.

It is a sad reflection that in this United States Senate only fourteen members of the United States Senate are willing to encourage the Young Men's Christian Association in trying to call the minds of the boys back to the old mother that they left at home on the farm or in the village when they came to be a part of the great city.

So I say the Senator may call me puerile and may accuse me of wasting the time of the Senate; but, sir, in my opinion, before the Senator shall leave this Chamber and before any of us shall leave this Chamber, by the expiration of our terms, we will perhaps have reconsidered this matter and thought we might at least have done as much for the young men as to have indorsed the movement that is being started. It is not a very large movement; it is not very great as yet; it is not very long since its inception; but it is a movement which, if at the beginning of it could have had the impetus of the support and the moral uplift a resolution of this sort would have given them, would have meant untold things for good to the young men of the land.

ADDITIONAL AIDS TO NAVIGATION.

Mr. FRYE. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the bill relating to light-houses.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives, the title of which will be stated.

The bill (H. R. 20784) to authorize additional aids to navigation in the Light-House Establishment, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, owing to the peculiar condition of affairs in the House of Representatives, that bill has received the consideration of the Senate Committee on Commerce, and, as a result of that consideration, I ask that it be placed on the Calendar as if reported from the committee. Possibly I may be instructed to offer some amendments when the bill is up for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine, under instructions from the Committee on Commerce, reports from that committee House bill 20784, the title of which has been stated. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I did not understand the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. I said that this bill had received the consideration of the Senate Committee on Commerce and that I was authorized to report it to the Senate and have it placed upon the Calendar, reserving the right, possibly, to offer some amendments to it when it is up for consideration.

Mr. BACON. The thing which I did not understand was something the Senator said about the other House.

Mr. FRYE. I was only alluding to the press of business in the House and the possibility that this bill might not be able to receive a second consideration there if it should be amended here.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. FRYE. Yes.

Mr. KEAN. Did I understand the Senator from Maine to report back this bill for additional aids to navigation without amendment?

Mr. FRYE. I reported it back, and stated that possibly I might, under instructions from the committee, offer some amendments when it is up for consideration.

Mr. KEAN. I only want to state to the Senator from Maine that I am very anxious to have placed on that bill an amendment that has been passed many times by the Senate, and I trust the Committee on Commerce will report it favorably.

SUSPENSION OF COMMODITY CLAUSE, INTERSTATE-COMMERCE LAW.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, under the unanimous-consent agreement the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Joint resolution (S. R. 74) suspending the commodity clause of the present interstate-commerce law.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I was asked by the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce [Mr. ELKINS], before he was compelled to leave the city for a few days, to ask each day that the unfinished business might be laid aside. I told him I would do that for a day or two, but I wanted to make some other business the unfinished business, and if he were not back in a day or two I would move to substitute as the unfinished business the business I had in mind. I think, however, I will let this go over for the present, but I take advantage of this opportunity to say that on Monday I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 5729, for relief of the discharged soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry. For the present I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN obtained the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment to present an amendment?

Mr. WARREN. I should like to know whether the agricultural appropriation bill is before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay that bill before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19158) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me for morning business?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Morning business is not in order under the rule.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is why I wanted to present it before the bill was taken up.

Mr. WARREN. Then, I ask that we proceed with the consideration of the appropriation bill.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. CARTER. I ask the Senator to yield to me to secure the adoption of an order.

Mr. SMOOT. If it will lead to no discussion.

Mr. CARTER. It will lead to no discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I yield.

Mr. CARTER. With the permission of the Senator from Utah, I ask unanimous consent for an order for the printing of a document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the rule of the Senate it is the duty of the Chair to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that that is not now in order.

Mr. CARTER. And unanimous consent can not be granted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent can not be granted under the rule of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not think it necessary, after listening to the most eloquent speech of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] and the very logical address of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] upon this appropriation bill, to speak at length, but I do feel it is necessary to take up a short time of the Senate this morning in answering some of the innuendoes, insinuations, complaints, and charges against the Forestry Division. I wish to state that for three years past I have listened in this Chamber to the same complaints and to similar charges. I have not felt that it was my duty to answer them before, and have contented myself in the past with investigating the charges made, where specific ones were mentioned, for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was any truth or foundation in them. I have found in the past that all the insinuations and charges made, when investigated, have proved to have very little truth in them, and most of them to be utterly false.

Mr. President, I want the Senate and the country to know that as a Senator from one of the mountain States where forest reserves have been created I have taken interest enough in these questions to investigate them thoroughly and know whereof I speak.

The great question of forestry and its effect upon the growth and development of a nation are worthy of the most careful study and consideration by the law-making power. America, the greatest nation on earth, has been negligent in the past in the proper care and preservation of her forests, but I trust the policy we have adopted, late as it is, will be maintained, and that no backward step will be taken. I believe the policy of conserving the products and increasing by reforestation the timber of the forests of our country is here to stay. I care not who says it is not; my judgment tells me it is. I believe the people in the East as well as the West are in favor of it. I believe through absolute necessity the American people have been convinced in the last few years that the policy of the preservation of the forests of our country came too late, and from now on they must be controlled for the people instead of being owned by a few timber barons.

I wish to refer to the forest reserves of the State of Utah, for I have given them personal attention and know of the benefits they have been to the people, not only to those using the reserves, but to the farming interests in the valleys and the water supply of the cities.

The reserves have been under the supervision of the Forest Service long enough to compare successfully present conditions with past, as affecting the growth of young timber, grazing, and the protection of our watersheds. The change has been marvelous, and all in favor of the regulations of the Forest Service. Mr. President, if the system of grazing, which had been followed for twenty years before, had been continued five years longer within the present forest reserves, the grass and forage would have been greatly reduced, if not virtually destroyed, and as a result the sheep and cattle interests of our State would have severely suffered. If we overstock a private pasture, the productive quantity of feed grows less each year, and it is but a very short time before it will scarcely sustain any life. It is so with the great national pastures, and particularly so in a mountainous country.

The regulation of the forest reserves means the preservation of the trees, the preservation of the watersheds, and the preservation of the feed for our stock, and all should be interested in these worthy objects.

As I look at that map upon the wall it is a warning to me, and should be to every American citizen, that our forests are fast passing away; and, Mr. President, I can not help but think that the man who says it is only a question of prophecy and not a question of fact has not studied the conditions as he should.

A level-headed philosopher once said: "Save me from my friends." When the eloquent Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] was professing his undying loyalty to the preservation of the forests of this country, I could not help but say: "Save the American forest from its friends; it will take care of its enemies." The Senator said he believed in the preservation of the forests "for the people" and not "from the people."

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in my State to-day there are five men—yea, Mr. President, I believe ten of them—using the public forests and the ranges within those forests where one used them ten years ago. Ten years ago the cattle interests of the State were in the hands of a few men; ten years ago there were sheep men owning ten, fifteen, and twenty thousand head of sheep. They had so many of them, Mr. President, that the man who started in business on a small scale was absolutely at the mercy of these large flock masters, and if he secured any chance of grazing his sheep at all, it was upon areas that had been already fed over. To-day there is not a man in all the State who has a permit for more than 2,000 head of sheep for any reserve in the State, and I know that with respect to some of the reserves the limit is but 785 head. So, as far as the possibility of the use of forest reserves is concerned, I say under the policy of the Forest Division they are being used by the people, and not by a few favored individuals.

There has been complaint made that this vast estate, carved out of the public lands of the United States, takes that much land from citizens seeking homes, and prevents the people from settling and making their homes in that part of the country. Mr. President, I can not conceive of a man making such a statement and believing it to be true.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] said the citizens of this country were hungry for land. The trouble is their hunger for land within a forest reserve in many cases is not satisfied with land they can cultivate and make farms upon, but it must be a particular kind of land, and must be covered with trees, and it is this class of cases that are bitterly complaining of the Forest Service interfering with their rights.

Mr. President, there is in the RECORD now a list presented by the Senator from Idaho of some 29 homestead entrymen claiming that the Forestry Service has interfered with their receiving title to their land. Since that statement was made I have taken interest enough to go to the Land Department and find out just what there is in the claim, and before I am through I wish to call attention to the facts as they exist.

A hundred years ago there were within the United States one million square miles of the most magnificent forests in the world. Not twenty years ago people were saying it was inexhaustible; that it could not in the lifetime of this nation be consumed; and yet to-day we are absolutely facing a timber famine. I have noticed through the reports that there are one hundred billion feet of timber and wood of all kinds consumed annually in this country; and in connection with that it is estimated that only one-third of that amount is produced by new growth upon all the forests in this country.

Mr. President, where are we going to get our timber when our supply is exhausted? Not from Canada, for I believe that Canada will make the necessary laws at an early date to preserve her great forests from destruction. I have traveled through some of her forests, and I know what a magnificently timbered country it is, and the Canadian government will see, if I am not mistaken, that her forests are protected. Not from South America, because the timber that is grown there is not of the class of timber usually required in the United States. Not from Siberia, because the timbers there are so far from water transportation that it makes their use almost prohibitory.

What is the next best thing for this country to do? Protect what we have, and reforest the denuded areas of our country. If the policy which has been adopted and is now in vogue by the Forestry Division is allowed to be carried out to a successful conclusion, I know it will be the means of providing this nation with timber sufficient for its absolute needs for generations to come.

In our forest reserves there are a great many millions of feet cut, but I notice that one-third of all the timber that has been used from the forest reserves in this country has been given, absolutely without cost, to the people living adjacent to the reserves. The other two-thirds have been sold—sold in the way that the rules and regulations of the Department have set out. Citizens have been asked to bid upon the timber sold, and any citizen of the United States had a perfect right to bid upon it, and from the sales a revenue has been derived by the Government, and in some instances nearly enough to pay the cost of the care and protection of the reserve.

Mr. President, the protection of the timber in these forest reserves is but one advantage. Another one and a most important one is the protection of our watersheds. The watersheds of every stream need protection, and that can only be accomplished by preventing overgrazing and the removal of trees and undergrowth. Where the undergrowth has been fed off and the trees removed, the land becomes parched and its surface so hard it can not retain the moisture that may fall.

Take my own State. I know in one county that four years ago, and before that almost every year, there were spring floods that brought the débris from the hills, covering the farms with rocks, gravel, and stumps, and thousands and thousands of dollars were expended each year in trying to prevent their recurrence. A forest reserve was established, covering the watersheds of all streams; regulations prohibiting grazing within a given number of miles from the streams were enforced, and the result has been that for the last four years no floods have occurred in that particular county, notwithstanding last year a greater fall of moisture occurred than had fallen for a number of years before. So far as the people of Utah are concerned, they are in favor of forest reserves, and no amount of inflammatory talk can change their views, as they have already experienced the value of forest reserves. I believe the time is fast approaching when other States will see the absolute necessity of them, and I look to see the time when not a single solitary voice will be raised against the Forestry Service.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] in his speech the other day said he had lived for thirty years in the forests, and that he did not think ten trees had been cut wantonly during that whole time. I hold in my hand some photographs of timbered lands in the State of Idaho, and it seems to me I can count more than ten trees upon this one photograph that have been wantonly cut. This was in Shoshone County, at Fishhook Creek and St. Joe River. The timber was cut from Government land and some from railroad lands. No animals are used. The logs are rolled in by hand. Cedar logs only are cut. I might go on and call the attention of the Senate to dozens of other such cases. No one claims that timber, owned by the Government, growing upon Government land, should not be used for the advancement of civilization. It has in the past and will be in the future used for the building of houses, the building of barns, the building of mammoth business blocks, and in all the modern necessities requiring timber. I do not believe for a minute an appeal to the people will be successful if based upon the statement that because an entryman on a forest reserve does not build a modern house and is content with a little cabin he should not be entitled to the land entered by him. No Department of this Government has ever taken that position. When the question of title to an entry is passed upon it is not decided upon the point whether the entryman lives in a small log cabin or whether it is a modern home.

The Senator from Idaho spoke of the humble cottage of Lincoln. Mr. President, Lincoln did live in an humble cottage, and he made it his home in good faith. I have seen in the forest reserves in the West cottages constructed even more pretentious than the cottage home of the immortal Lincoln, with no thought of making them a permanent home for the entrymen, but simply for the purpose of a temporary abode, in the hope that they could secure title to the land and by securing the title secure the vast estate of timber on it.

No one, Mr. President, has more sympathy with the pioneer home maker than I have. My father was a pioneer of the West. In 1847 he located away out in the Rocky Mountains a thousand miles from civilization. I was born there and have seen the hardships of pioneer life. I have experienced a little of it. My mother was also a pioneer of that country, walking every step of the way from the Missouri River to the valley of the Salt Lake; and God knows I would not advocate anything that would increase the burden of an honest pioneer home builder. I know, and every sane person knows, it seems to me, with respect to the pioneer who goes to the West for the purpose of honestly establishing a home, that the question of a domicile, whether it be humble or pretentious, cuts no figure whatever. I say success to the pioneer who seeks to secure a permanent home under any law of this country.

Mr. President, before I get through I want to call attention to the fact that there are dishonest locators, also timber thieves in the guise of home seekers, and these are the people that are making such bitter attacks upon the Forestry Service.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. If it will not interrupt the Senator, as he has given a great deal of thought and study to the subjects, I should like to ask him a question. He has investigated it very carefully. I will ask whether or not in his investigations of those who are complaining about the Forestry Service he has found any complaint other than from those who have been charged something more than they had been in the past or who were desirous of now obtaining something without any charge at all. In other words, the only complaint these people have is that the Government is now conducting the public domain in a businesslike way and asking compensation for what citizens receive?

Mr. SMOOT. I thank the Senator from California for calling my attention to this fact, and I take it for granted that there is not a man in the United States who has studied this question for one moment who does not know that that is absolutely true. Of course a man who has had the use of the public domain for years and years, who has had control of vast areas now in forest reserves for the running of cattle and sheep, and never paid one cent for it, will naturally complain, even when asked to bear only a portion of the expense attendant upon the administration and preservation of the same.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I did not distinctly hear the colloquy between the Senator from Utah and the Senator from California. Do I understand the Senator to state that the only people who are finding fault with the administration of the Forestry Service are those who are complaining because they are charged more than they were years ago?

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator from Wyoming was asking a question of the Senator from California. I do not think that the question asked by the Senator from California went that far, but he did say that in the great majority of cases it was that class of people, and I say so, too, Mr. President.

There is another thing I wish to say, and that is this: If any person makes a complaint to the Forestry Service or to the General Land Office of this Government, it is immediately investigated, and I have confidence enough to believe that if the complaint is just it will be righted, and righted quickly.

From the remarks of the Senator from Idaho we were led to believe that Idaho was being robbed by the Forestry Service in leasing her school lands—sections 16 and 36. I can positively state that Mr. Pinchot (the Forester), the General Land Office, and the Secretary of the Interior are now and always have been only too anxious to have the State receive its pro rata of the proceeds from school sections within a forest reserve, and I know there have been propositions made the States time and time again looking to that end. The State of Idaho has been offered the chance to accept four alternative ways of settlement with the Government of the school sections within the forest reserves of that State. What are they, Mr. President? First, the State to select lieu lands outside of the reserves. Second, to select lieu lands in as compact a body as possible inside of the reserves, and maintain the selection as a State park, to be administered by the State or by the Forest Division, and if by the Forest Division, all the receipts to go to the State. Third, to ascertain the number of acres of school lands in the reserve, and charge the State with the pro rata of the cost of administration and pay to it the pro rata of all revenues received. Fourth, to let the unsurveyed school sections be administered by the Forestry Division until they are surveyed, and then the State may use them and dispose of them as it may see fit.

Mr. President, is there anything more fair? Is there anything in this proposition that would justify a Senator in saying that the Forest Division was robbing the State of the revenues from all the school sections within the forest reserves in the State?

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. As I understand from the statement of the Senator from Utah, instead of its being a disadvantage to the State of Idaho to have these school sections included within forest reserves, it is really a benefit in this, that the State now obtains a revenue from the school sections, whereas if it was in the open country, without a reserve, the State would receive no income.

Mr. SMOOT. Before ever the forest reserves were created those school sections, both surveyed and unsurveyed, were in the public domain, and anybody could graze them, no matter whether they were citizens of Idaho or not. But to-day it is otherwise.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So that it amounts to this, that before this Service, as pointed out by the Senator from California, some one man got all the benefit of the Government's and even of the State's property, whereas now the State and all the people thereof get the benefit.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not want to say that one man——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Whoever herded his flocks free of charge.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say it was a few men.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. A few men is the same thing. A few men herded their flocks free of charge, whereas now all of the people of the State get the advantage.

Mr. SMOOT. In connection with the school sections in the State of Idaho within forest reserves I find the following in the able address of the Senator from Idaho:

Mr. DIXON. But has the Congress of the United States ever attempted in any way to interfere with the State of Idaho as to ousting her from the control or ownership of sections 16 and 36?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I am glad the Senator asked me that question. I will call his attention to it right on the record. They are attempting, or assuming, to dole out to the States the proceeds of those lands. They have been selling some timber off the 16's and 36's in Idaho.

Mr. DIXON. Without the consent of the State of Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly. The State of Idaho has taken no legislative action on the subject. I have here its official action, and will call the attention of the Senate to it directly. They have taken possession of and placed these 16's and 36's under the dominion of the Forester; they have sold timber, and they notified us the other day officially that we have "nineteen thousand and some dollars to your credit."

The Forest Service has sold no timber from surveyed school sections 16 and 36 in the State of Idaho. It may be that sales of timber have occurred from unsurveyed lands that if surveyed would prove to be sections 16 and 36, but neither the Forester nor any other person can tell that until the lands are surveyed.

Grant that sales were in the same proportion for school sections as for all other sections within the reserve, let us see whether Idaho has been unjustly dealt with or not. Sections 16 and 36 in a township amount to one-eighteenth of the township. The sale of timber from all forest reserves in Idaho for the fiscal year 1907 amounted to $55,173.31; timber settlements $852.31; timber trespass $4,968.89; grazing $137,384.67; special uses $477.25; showing a net amount received from the forest reserves of the State of Idaho, after refunding $2,939.86, of $195,916.57. One-eighteenth of this amount is $10,884.25. Idaho received $19,591.65, or a difference in favor of Idaho of $8,707.40.

I do not think, Mr. President, that the Senate has shown any inclination to rob the State of Idaho, for I remember as a member of the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate voting for a bill, aye, two of them, granting a million acres of land each, or a total of two million acres, to the State of Idaho, to be entered under the Carey Act—two million acres, and not a cent to be paid to the Government for it.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. And, Mr. President, I want to say that I am heartily in favor of such legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. I call the attention of the Senator to the further fact that this is in addition to one million acres of land that the State of Idaho heretofore obtained from the National Government under the same act.

Mr. SMOOT. There were a million acres given to the different States in the West at the time of the passage of the act, and as the Senator from California says, it makes three million acres all told. I was in favor of granting it to the State of Idaho. I was in favor of granting two million acres to the State of Wyoming; for, Mr. President, I felt that in doing so we were providing an additional chance for citizens to secure homes. But I assure you of one thing, that men taking homes under the Carey Act will never be permitted to take lands covered with trees.

This question of school sections has been under discussion for a number of years. Plans that would meet with the approval of all the States have been outlined and submitted to most of the governors of the Western States. I have letters here from the governor of South Dakota. I have a letter here addressed to the governor of Idaho upon the same subject, making practically the same kind of propositions that I stated all the States could avail themselves of if they thought proper.

So it is not a fault of the Government. And no department of the Government wants to take control in any way of the school sections in a State or even in a forest reserve. It is said that the Government has eliminated this vast forest reserve estate from the public domain, thereby preventing people from making homes and becoming citizens of the State in which the reserves are located. I call attention to the act of June 11, 1906, which provides that citizens may make a homestead in a forest reserve, and they have done it by the thousands. Not only that, Mr. President, but the Department has asked for an additional hundred thousand dollars to pay men to examine entries within the forest reserves so that they can be acted upon as speedily as possible.

Mr. President, there has been considerable said here in relation to grazing regulations. Considerable complaint has been made that the Forestry Service has violated the law, and that the laws of the United States are such that where the Government land within a forest reserve is not fenced it precludes the Government from bringing an action against trespassers.

The act of Congress of July 4, 1897 (30 Stat. L., 35), authorized the Secretary of the Interior to make "rules and regulations" "to regulate the occupancy and use" of the national forests and to "preserve the forests thereon from destruction." And the same act of Congress expressly made the violation of such rules and regulations a crime and prescribed punishment.

Under the authority of the act the Secretary of the Interior prohibited the grazing of sheep on some portions of some of the national forests.

His action was questioned and his prohibitory regulation was violated.

The Government brought an action to test the validity of the regulations of the Secretary of the Interior. The action was for an injunction. It was brought in the circuit court for the northern district of California. The court, in August, 1902, granted the injunction and held that the regulations were valid and that Congress in authorizing the Secretary to make them had not delegated legislative power. (See United States v. Dastervigues, 118 Fed. Rep., 199, Use Book, p. 204.) The defendant was not satisfied and took the case to the circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit. On March 2, 1903, the circuit court of appeals sustained the judgment of the court below. (See Dastervigues v. United States, 122 Fed. Rep., 30; Use Book, p. 205.)

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FULTON. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the authority which the Department has sought to exercise and which was brought in question as far as my remarks were concerned was that of imposing fines and prosecuting, by criminal action, people whose stock had not been driven but had wandered upon the reserve.

The fact that the courts have held that an injunction may be maintained and civil suit prosecuted to protect the lands is an entirely different proposition. A private owner of lands can by injunction protect his lands against willful trespassers. If the Senator himself has a tract of land on which people are willfully forcing their stock he has a civil remedy.

What I contended was that the Government occupies no other relation than that of a proprietor so far as the public lands are concerned, and that it is without authority to make it a crime for stock to run at large in a State in violation of the laws and the policy of the State. A civil suit is an entirely different proposition and presents an entirely different question.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was not upon the question the Senator has brought up, but as he has brought it up I want to say this in answer to him.

A recent case of this character was that of the United States v. Domingo et al. in the district court of the United States within and for the central division of the district of Idaho.

The defendant demurred to the indictment on the ground that a breach of the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture was not a criminal offense. The demurrer was overruled on March 14, 1907, by Beatty, district judge, whose opinion is reported in volume 152 of the Federal Reporter at page 566 and is reprinted in the Use Book at page 208. After the overruling of the demurrer, the defendants were convicted of a misdemeanor for having driven a band of sheep upon the national forest without a permit. No appeal was taken, and the case has been closed.

Other decisions to the same effect as that of Judge Beatty, above cited, are: Dent v. United States (76 Pac. Rep., 455, supreme court of Arizona); United States v. Bale (156 Fed. Rep., 687); United States v. Deguirre (152 Fed. Rep., 568).

The Domingo, Bale, and Deguirre cases are more recent than the case of United States v. Matthews (146 Fed. Rep., 306), in which Judge Whitson of the eastern district of Washington held that the violation of the regulations of the Secretary was not a crime.

This important question has never been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States, because, prior to the passage of the criminal appeals act, March 2, 1907 (34 Stat., 1246), the Government had no right to appeal in such cases and in every instance where the judgment of the court was against the defendant the fine imposed has been paid.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield further?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. FULTON. I am well aware, Mr. President, that two district judges have so held. Other district judges have held to the contrary. But the Supreme Court itself has finally and for all time settled the matter, holding that mere regulations, although authorized by law, can not impose a penalty and can not authorize the prosecution of a criminal case or a criminal charge.

Mr. SMOOT. That, I believe, is true as to all of the cases cited already by the Senator from Idaho and also by the Senator from Colorado, but they were cases that were carried to the Supreme Court before the creation of a forest reserve, and it was land that was in the public domain.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, does the Senator think there is or can he point out a distinction, so far as the exercise of legislative power is concerned by a Department, between a forest reserve and any other public land?

Mr. SMOOT. All I have to say is that the judges of the circuit court of the United States seem to think so.

Mr. FULTON. I think the Senator is mistaken in regard to that, because the Supreme Court of the United States has lately held, and held since the decisions the Senator is citing, that the Department is without such authority, and in the nature of things must be without it, because it is a delegation of legislative power.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would rather proceed now.

Mr. FULTON. I beg pardon for interrupting the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all, I will gladly yield at any time. At the time of the later decision I have just cited a criminal action for the violation of the regulations was pending in the supreme court of Arizona. It was contended that the decision of the circuit court of appeals would not apply in the criminal case, but the supreme court of Arizona followed it and the defendant was convicted. (See case of Joseph Dent v. United States. 76 Pac. Rep., 455, Use Book, p. 206.)

These decisions were all made before the control of national forests was transferred from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture. On October 2, 1906, after such transfer, the district court of the northern district of California sustained an indictment for a violation of the grazing regulations and fined the defendants. (See United States v. Deguirre, et al., 152 Fed. Rep., 568.)

There was considerable stress laid upon the fact that some poor fellow living out in Colorado and driving his stock from one part of the county to the other happened to pass over a part of a forest reserve and was met by the forester and prevented from doing so, and for the act of trespass he was fined the sum of $25. In pathetic terms the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] painted this picture to the Senate as one that sustained the charge of this czar-like power of the Forestry Division.

This is what is known as the W. K. Ross grazing trespass case, and I am going to state the absolute facts touching the case. It has received considerable publicity through the Southwest, due largely to the evident intention of Mr. Ross to enlist the sympathy and aid of persons not conversant with the facts in the case, and to his desire to pose as a martyr to bureaucratic rule. He is a very hard man to deal with because he refuses to be convinced, even when evidence to the contrary of the most pronounced character is presented to him.

Mr. Ross was accused of having committed a trespass in the San Francisco Mountains National Forest by driving 17 head of horses across the forest, from his ranch to the town of Williams, Ariz., without permit and after the grazing season had expired.

He declares that he was not given a chance to present his side of the case in the action for trespass, but this statement is absolutely untrue. Efforts were made by Forest Ranger R. L. Neil at the time when the trespass was discovered to settle the case amicably by having Mr. Ross take out a free-crossing permit. Mind you, Senators, all that was required of him was simply to take out a free-crossing permit, but he not only refused to take out the permit, but also refused to give the officer any information that might tend to clear up the case. A second effort was made by Mr. Neil to settle the case on December 22. This also failed. The case was then taken up by the supervisor, stating the charge against him, and informing him that he would be given ten days in which to make a reply before the matter was reported to the Forester.

The letter written at this time is the one that Mr. Ross has had published. Inclosed with the letter was a blank form, proposition of settlement, on which Mr. Ross was at liberty to state his side of the case, if he knew he had been wrongfully charged with trespass. This he declined to do. The statement in Supervisor Breen's letter that he would recommend that the sum of $25 be accepted in settlement of the trespass was merely an expression to Mr. Ross of his estimate of the damage, and left it open for Mr. Ross to offer such amount as he saw fit. At the same time he was informed that if he did not make a settlement of the case, which might have been done by showing that he had not committed a trespass, it would be necessary to refuse him a grazing permit the coming year and cancel his leases.

When the case was reported to the Forester a letter was written to Supervisor Breen telling him that it might be possible that Mr. Ross did not understand what the proposition of settlement was for, and hence thought that he was not to be allowed to present his side of the case, and informing him that the Forester prefers to settle all cases of grazing trespass amicably if possible, and does not desire to commence criminal proceedings unless absolutely necessary in order to protect the interests of the national forests.

Further investigation of this case by the Forester disclosed the fact that Mr. Ross had committed only a technical violation of the regulations that was not of sufficient importance to warrant prosecution, and the case was dropped.

The fact that a trespass charge was made against Mr. Ross will not jeopardize his rights to privileges upon the national forests, and any applications he may make will be considered upon their merits and will be acted upon without prejudice.

Another case that has been referred to by the Senator from Colorado was where it is claimed a poor man went upon a forest reserve and while there gathered a load of pine knots, for which the ranger demanded 25 cents, and this was also pointed to as a case of the bureaucratic rule of the Forest Service.

Mr. President, I have a copy of a letter from Hon. Gifford Pinchot, the Forester, which is as follows:

APRIL 13, 1903.

Hon. HENRY M. TELLER,
United States Senator.

MY DEAR SENATOR: My attention has been called to the following statement made by you in the Senate on April 7 (RECORD, p. 4642):

"A very well-known settler said to me: 'I drove on the forest reserve my horses and wagon, and I picked up a load of pine knots, and when I drove off there was a forest ranger there who said: "You must pay for these pine knots." And I finally gave him a quarter of a dollar to avoid arrest.'"

If the above statement made to you is correct, the forest ranger was guilty of extortion and should be dismissed from the Service. I will therefore be very greatly indebted to you if you will give me the name of your informant and any other facts which will aid me in securing the punishment which this public officer deserves if he is guilty.

Very sincerely, yours, GIFFORD PINCHOT, Forester.

That letter was written April 13, 1908, and up to the present time no word in answer to it has been received.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I did not catch the name of the writer of the letter.

Mr. SMOOT. The writer of the letter is Mr. Pinchot, the Chief Forester.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have no doubt the information which the Senator has just given the Senate that the letter remains unanswered also comes from Mr. Pinchot.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt of it. I asked for the information.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to some figures and a statement of the damage done by forest fires covering a period of years past, and comparing the past, when there were no forest reserves, with the conditions to-day. I find in the reports, under the heading of "Loss of life," 1,956 people have perished within thirty years from forest fires, or an average of 65 lives per year.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all over the country, I suppose.

Mr. SMOOT. All over the country.

Under the head of "Destruction of property" the official census for 1880 gives the area burned per year as 10,000,000 acres, and the Division of Forestry in 1891 collected records of 12,000,000 acres burned over in one year. The value of the timber destroyed is estimated at from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 a year. In addition to the loss of merchantable timber, new growth of equal or greater value is destroyed. While now the area burned over every year is somewhat smaller the damage is not less but even greater, for the stumpage value has increased since 1880 at least five times, and therefore it is now necessary to burn only 2,000,000 acres annually to cause the same amount of damage. The cost of fire patrol upon the national forests amounts to less than 1 cent per acre. No civilized country on earth spends less, but all spend more.

That the estimate of the fire loss is not exaggerated can be seen from a few examples of individual fires. The Hinckley fire in Minnesota in 1894, for instance, burned over an area of 250 miles, killed 418 people, and, entirely apart from the vast quantities of timber burned, destroyed $750,000 worth of property. A fire in Washington and Oregon in 1902 destroyed $12,000,000 worth of timber. We must not forget that all big conflagrations start from small fires, which under fire patrol would probably be checked.

Through forest fires there is a loss of soil fertility the value of which can not even be estimated, and damage to river courses and property along them due to floods that cost the nation many millions of dollars a year.

The Forest Service, by fire patrol, reduced the burned-over area on the national forests from 0.66 of 1 per cent in 1904, the year before the forests were put under its control, to 0.16 of 1 per cent in 1905, 0.12 per cent in 1906, and 0.07 per cent in 1907. The total area burned over within the national forests in 1907 was approximately 100,000 acres, and the loss $31,000.

The other day, Mr. President, in the arraignment of the poor forest rangers the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] recited a case in one of the forest reserves of his State of a legislator being shot. In an interview with the Senator from Idaho, which was published in the Northern Idaho News under date of August 22, 1907, the statement was made that a ranger riding along a public highway had demanded exclusive right of way against Hon. A. H. Connor of Wallace, and had opened fire upon him with a gun.

From a report dated August 19, 1907, from the supervisor of the Coeur d'Alene National Forest, it appears that F. A. Wagner was temporarily employed as a guard, and not a ranger as charged, and that he had been discharged on July 22, having served seven days. His dismissal was due to his misconduct and discourtesy toward a citizen in disputing with him for the right of way over the public road. In this the supervisor adjudged him guilty and entirely at fault. While Wagner had been temporarily employed for but seven days, his action clearly showed his unfitness for employment in the Forest Service. The supervisor acted promptly upon his own initiative and in strict accordance with the regulations of the Service and the dictates of common sense. I have certain clippings from the Northern Idaho News giving the interview with Senator HEYBURN, and the copy of the Acting Forester's letter to the editor of the Northern Idaho News.

Mr. President, I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD that part of the interview and also the letter of Mr. Adams, if there be no objection.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that it be read. I do not like to have things introduced into the RECORD to be printed without reading.

Mr. SMOOT. I have noticed, however, in the past that the Senator from Idaho has done it quite often. However, at the request of the Senator from Idaho, I will read the interview.

Mr. HEYBURN. If you please.

Mr. SMOOT. The interview reads:

A few days since one of these rangers riding along a public highway, not within a forest reserve, mounted on horseback, armed to the teeth, demanded the exclusive right of way as against a member, A. H. Connor, of Wallace, of the legislature of Idaho—

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me a moment there?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. The party who interviewed me made a mistake in the name. It was not Mr. Connor, it was Mr. Herman J. Rossi. They were both members of the legislature.

Mr. SMOOT. The letter of Mr. Adams will so state. I am reading, however, from the interview. It continues:

driving along the public highway with his family in a carriage, and because the carriage hub grazed some part of this mounted authority, he opened fire upon this member of the legislature with a gun and at the trial for this offense, sought to justify himself on the ground that he was a forestry officer and that the people must get out of his way.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will permit me, the interview is correct except as to the name of the member of the legislature. I am not responsible for the interviewer making that mistake. I suppose he happened to be acquainted with the fact that Mr. Connor was a member of the legislature and had forgotten the name I mentioned. I mentioned the correct name; but the statement of facts was as developed at the trial of this man in court.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to ask the Senator a question while he is on his feet. In your remarks the other day you stated that this ranger shot the legislator. Is not that true?

Mr. HEYBURN. In my statement the other day I said that he shot at him. I noticed the statement in the Washington newspapers in regard to that, which gave the impression that it was the man in the carriage who refused to give the right of way. I did not so state. It was the forest ranger who refused to give the right of way.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not take especial notice of newspaper reports. Sometimes they are true and sometimes they are not. I am answering the charge found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and had interest enough in it to find out what the facts in the case were.

But, Mr. President, if there is any case that could be cited to show that the Forestry Division will not stand for any wrong acts toward any citizen of this country, it is this case. This man was not a ranger; he was a temporary employee of the Government; he was simply a guard. He did not shoot the man. But I do not excuse him for even taking his pistol out and firing it; nor did the Department; and the Department acted promptly. They did not even wait for letters to pass between Washington and Idaho; but as soon as the supervisor learned what the employee had done he immediately discharged him. To me it seems that no more summary action could be taken, and taken properly, than that which was taken.

Mr. President, there has been complaint made that in this lump-sum appropriation the salaries of certain men are less than their expenses, and, by intimation at least, it was believed that these expenses were not altogether right. I have gone through the list of expenditures; I have taken every name where such a condition occurs; but I will only cite one case here, and ask that the others be placed in the RECORD:

Mr. D. D. Bronson, forest inspector, salary paid from the general expense, $466.67; from the Albuquerque Forest Reserve, $933.33; total, $1,400.

His duties were acting supervisor of Bull Run and Cascade National Forest and general inspection of forests.

Field travel and station expenses, $2,907.24.

And what were they for?

Services of laborers—practically all for fighting fires on the Cascade Reserve in July and August, 1906, $1,577.20; tools and equipment, $195.93; miscellaneous station expenses, $113.18; transportation (paid to railroads for travel on Government requests), $286.52; other travel expenses, $734.41, or a total expense of $2,907.24.

Mr. Bronson was a chief inspector at Albuquerque, N. Mex., in April, 1907, and part of his expenses were incurred in establishing office headquarters.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. WARREN. Evidently the Senator from Utah has looked this matter up thoroughly. I have not given so much attention to that particular thing. My observation was in examining accounts that there were very few, comparatively speaking, whose traveling expenses or mileage amounted to any considerable sum, and that they were always inspectors. I want to ask the Senator from Utah if the number is proportionately large, and if they are not usually inspectors where there is much traveling expenses?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say that in nearly every case they are inspectors and they are sent from one forest reserve to another. In the case above cited there was $734.41 of the total expenses for traveling expenses. He was an inspector and acted under orders of the Department here at Washington.

With the leave of the Senate I will insert a complete statement of all of these cases.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection permission is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

MAY 1, 1908.

D. D. Bronson, forest inspector; salary paid from general expense, $466.67; administration forest reserve, $933.33; total, $1,400. Duties, acting supervisor of Bull Run and Cascade (N) National forests and general inspection of forests.

Field travel and station expenses $2,907.24

Expended as follows:

Services of laborers—practically all for fighting fire on the Cascade (N) in July and August, 1906	1,577.20
Tools and equipment	195.93
Miscellaneous station expenses	113.18
Transportation (paid to railroads for travel on Government requests)	286.52
Other travel expenses	734.41
Total	2,907.24

Mr. Bronson was made chief inspector at Albuquerque, N. Mex., in April, 1907, and part of his expenses were incurred in establishing office headquarters.

M. L. Erickson, assistant forest inspector; salary, $1,200; duties, general inspection, acting forest supervisor, Fremont and Goose Lake forests from February 18 to May 31, 1907. Total expenses, $1,303.78.

Of the above amount $185.50 was for travel on transportation requests. Of the remaining $1,118.28, reimbursement accounts, a large part was for services of temporary laborers, supplies, equipment, etc., on the Fremont and Goose Lake forests.

Edward A. Sherman, forest supervisor; chief forest inspector; salary received for fiscal year 1907, general expenses, $500; administration forest reserve, $1,400; total, $1,900. Duties, supervisor of Bitter Root, Hell Gate, and Lolo. General inspection work. Total expenses, $1,279.13.

Of the above amount, $220.45 was for travel on transportation requests. Most of the remaining expenses, $1,058.68, was incurred in connection with the administration of the Bitter Root, Hell Gate, and Lolo national forests. This expense includes cost of temporary labor, supplies and equipment, and necessary travel performed in the administration of these areas.

He was made a chief inspector at Missoula, Mont., in April, 1907, and part of his expense was incurred in the establishment of headquarters.

MAY 1, 1908.

J. D. Guthrie, forest assistant, July 1, 1906; salary, $1,000. Duties, forest planting work, July 1 to February 28; reserve boundaries, March 1 to June 30; expended, $1,137.52.

Of this amount $220.11 was for travel on transportation requests.

The remainder, $917.41, was expended for travel and subsistence in forest planting work on the national forests and in the examination of lands to be included in national forests. In this work it was necessary to hire saddle and pack animals and purchase food supplies, etc.

MAY 1, 1908.

W. H. B. Kent, forest assistant, at $1,000 and $1,400; salary paid, $1,200; expenses, $1,591.83. Duties, forest boundary work; examination of homestead applications under act of June 11, 1906; general inspection.

The "field, travel, and station expenses" were as follows:

Paid to railroads direct by Forest Service for travel on Government requests		$579.74
Paid reimbursement accounts to Kent:
Tools and supplies	$35.19
Miscellaneous expenses	42.20
Travel expenses	934.70
		1,012.09
Total		1,591.83

This was in no way excessive, since Mr. Kent is a general inspector and is continually traveling from one forest to another to assist supervisors and look into administration matters under the direction of the Forester.

W. H. Mast, forest assistant; salary paid, general expense, $733.33; administration forest reservation, $355.67; total, $1,100. Duties, forest planting work, July 1, 1906, to February 28, 1907; forest assistant on Dismal River National Forest, March 1, 1907, to June 30; expenses, $1,822.07.

Of the above amount $102.87 was for travel on transportation requests.

Of the remainder, $1,719.20 paid on reimbursement accounts, the greater part was for temporary labor, supplies, and general station expenses on the Dismal River Forest while engaged on forestry planting work and experiments.

W. R. Mattoon, forest assistant; salary, $1,300. Duties, assistant in forest planting work; general inspection in forest planting work after May 16, 1907; total expenses, $1,820.25.

Of the above amount $126.70 was for travel on transportation requests. Of the balance, $1,693.55, the greater part was for labor and supplies and station expenses at Fort Bayard-Gila Forest where he was engaged in forest planting work and experiments. Was made inspector of planting work in the spring of 1907.

S. J. Record, forest assistant, at $1,300; chief of reconnaissance, at $1,600. Duties, timber sale work in the field until April, 1907, when assigned to reconnaissance, administrative inspection of field work. General expenses, $1,371.30; cooperative, $695.39.

Of the above amount $159.46 was for travel on transportation requests.

Of the remaining $1,211.84 paid on reimbursement accounts, part was for temporary assistants' wages and subsistence on timber sale work.

H. O. Stable, forest assistant; salary, $1,000. Duties, reserve boundary work; examination of claims under act of June 11, 1906. Total expenses, $1,202.93.

Of the above amount, $133.60 was for travel on transportation requests.

Of the remaining $1,069.33 spent for travel and station expenses a considerable amount was for the hire of assistants in examining lands under the act of June 11, 1906, and for the hire and maintenance of saddle and pack animals necessary in the proper execution of the work. A comparatively small amount was spent for personal traveling expenses.

MAY 1, 1908.

L. Von Wernstedt, forest expert, at $1,000; duties, reserve boundary work; examination of claims under act of June 11, 1906; expenses, $1,347.27.

Of the above amount $111.44 was for travel on transportation requests.

L. Von Wernstedt was engaged in the examination of lands under the act of June 11, 1906, during the greater part of the year. This work took him in a number of different forests and he was obliged to hire assistants and pay for their subsistence. A large part of the $1,235.83 paid him on reimbursement accounts was expended in this way.

MAY 1, 1908.

I. F. Eldredge, forest student from June 30, 1905, to September 9, 1906, at $300; forest assistant from September 10, 1906, to June 30, 1907, at $1,000; salary, fiscal year 1907, general expenses, $865.83; duties, timber-sale examination; expenses, $1,409.19.

A large proportion of this expense was for hire of temporary laborers, team hire, and other necessary field expenses while engaged on timber-sale examination.

Approximately $600 was expended for travel and subsistence.

MAY 1, 1908.

H. S. Bristol, expert, July 10, 1905; salary received for fiscal year 1907, general expenses, $1,000; duties, wood chemistry investigation, July 10, 1905, to June 30, 1906; total expenses, $1,263.80.

Practically all of the $1,263.80 reimbursed was for expenses connected with the administration of the experimental laboratory at Boston, Mass., operated under the direction of the Branch of Products of the Forest Service. The great portion of this expense was for supplies used in equipping the laboratory and, later, in moving it to Washington, D. C.

The actual travel expenses incurred were less than $300.

MAY 1, 1908.

J. H. Clark, assistant forest ranger to August 31, at $900; forest ranger from September 1 to June 30, at $1,200; salary received for fiscal year 1907, general expenses, $1,110; duties, reserve boundaries, September 1 to April 30; engineering May 1 to June 30; total expenses, $1,241.83.

Of this amount, $169.05 was for travel on transportation requests. A large part of the remaining expense, $1,072.83, was incurred in hire of laborers, supplies, etc., in the execution of field operations on the national forests. The operations include the retracing of obliterated surveys along the boundaries of national forests and in marking the boundaries so determined. Also the examination of agricultural lands in the national forests under the act of June 11, 1906.

George W. Peavy, forest assistant; salary, $1,300; duties, forest planting work, inspection of forest planting, general inspection; expenses, $2,660.05.

Of this amount $440.50 was for travel on transportation requests.

Of the remainder about three-fourths was for hire of laborers, supplies, etc., at the Pasadena planting station, of which Mr. Peavy had general charge a part of the year.

The balance was expended in connection with the regular inspection work of the Forest Service. Mr. Peavy was first engaged in the inspection of planting work on the National Forests and later in general inspection work.

Charles A. Scott, forest assistant, at $1,300 and $1,500, and forest supervisor, at $1,700 salary, fiscal year 1907; general expenses, $783.90; other appropriations, $670; total, $1,453.90. Duties, reserve planting work July 1 to January 14; forest supervisor, Niobrara, North Platte, Dismal River, and Garden City forests, January 15 to June 30; expenses, $1,978.96.

Of this amount $216.34 was for travel on transportation requests. The greater part of the remaining $1,762.62 was incurred in connection with the administration of the Dismal River, Niobrara, North Platte, and Garden City National Forests, of which Mr. Scott was in charge. This expense included hire of temporary labor, cost of equipment and supplies, and necessary travel performed in the administration of these forests, and the conduct of the planting experiments in operation at the same time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Keep Commission has spent considerable time in examining the different Departments of this Government to ascertain how their accounts are kept and to make certain recommendations as to improvement. As this lump-sum appropriation has been criticised very severely here, I thought there might be something in the question as affecting the Forest Division different from all other Departments of this Government. I have here the report made by that commission. It is a comparison of salaries paid civil officers and employees in Washington, D. C., or directly on detail therefrom, with total appropriations of each Department for the fiscal year 1906. It gives the name of every Department of this Government, the salaries on the statutory roll, the lump sum appropriated, the total salaries paid, the percentage of the salaries of the lump sum, and the percentage of the salaries of the statutory roll. I find that for the legislative department—our department, if you please—the statutory amount for that year was $400,150, or a percentage of 7 per cent; the lump sum appropriated for salaries was $4,726,481, or 93 per cent; while for the Department of Agriculture the statutory amount was $993,317, or 22.41 per cent, and the lump sum was $3,439,110, or 77.59 per cent. Mr. President, I will ask that this summary of all the Departments be placed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I live in a mining State, and I wish to say that not one single solitary complaint has been made to me against the Forest Service with reference to the workings of a mine, the location of a mine, or the development of a mine, and no complaint has been made that a ranger or a supervisor has ever interfered with a mine or a miner. No person is prevented from entering a forest reserve and locating and working a mining claim; but the records show that a great many of these people, hungry for land, have tried to have their appetite satisfied under the guise of mining-claim locations. The following instructions in regard to reports in mining claims appear in the Field Program for April, 1908:

Reports should be made on supposed invalid locations, to which an active claim is being asserted, if the claimants are interfering with timber sales or otherwise injuring national forest interests. If a sufficient description or identification of such locations can not be otherwise secured, supervisors should get the necessary information from the county records.

No reports are necessary on locations which have been abandoned, or of which no use is being made.

Reports on valid mining locations should not be made until application for patent is filed, unless claimants are cutting the timber or using the surface for any purpose other than mineral development, or are doing some other act indicative of bad faith or injurious to national forest interests.

In all cases prompt examination should be made and a report forwarded to the Forester, as soon as it is ascertained that application for patent has been filed.

There was the case of Frank E. Johnesse cited here by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. With pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah has had great experience in mining matters and the rules and regulations in reference to the locating of mines. I would ask him if, in his opinion, the rules and regulations laid down by the Department are too drastic, or, in his opinion, are they proper and right for the adequate protection of the forest reserves, and at the same time to give the miner a fair opportunity to locate and prove upon his claim?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the rules are not drastic, and no honest miner will ever object to them. It is only the dishonest man that will object to the rules and regulations affecting mining claims within a forest reserve.

Great stress has been laid upon the charge that a forest ranger is the final judge as to whether a mining location is a mine or not. The truth is that the examination of mining claims is not intrusted wholly to the forest rangers even when the claims are within a forest reserve. Where there is doubt as to the validity of a claim, expert miners and geologists from the Geological Department are always detailed to make the examination, and no action is taken by the Forest Service until the reports are received.

Referring now to the case of Frank E. Johnesse, Mr. President, I will say that the trouble in this case was that Mr. Johnesse violated the law. He was a trespasser. He was a manager of a mining company in Idaho. The claim that he was working contained no timber, or if it ever did contain timber, every stick of it had been cut off. He made a location on an adjoining claim on which was a growth of mining timber. He thought that the mere placing of a location notice upon it gave him a right to cut the timber from it for use elsewhere. He undertook to do it. To show that it was not located for the purpose of working as a mine I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the assessment was allowed to lapse from year to year. He never did any work to get a patent. He did not intend that it should be patented. All he wanted it for was for the timber that was on it. I have a letter here from the same gentlemen, acknowledging that he was a trespasser and sending to Washington the amount of $10.97 for the timber he had stolen.

Mr. President, there have been cases in my own State—in years past, however—of the same nature. I remember of speaking to a miner of my own State once as to a number of locations made by him, and I said: "What on earth are you going to do in that part of the country in the way of mining?" "Why," he said, "I do not ever intend to mine it; I intend to patent it, and when I receive a patent for it the timber that is on it is worth four or five times more than what it will cost me to patent the claims."

Cases are not lacking, Mr. President, of timber thieves trying to gobble up great tracts of timber land by placer-mining locations. Let me cite you to one instance—and there are plenty of them. This case is known as H. H. Yard placer claims in Shasta National Forest Reserve, of California.

H. H. Yard and associates between the years 1902 and 1906 located approximately 265,000 acres of land in Butte and Plumas counties, Cal., and within the Plumas and Diamond Mountain national forests. These claims are held by H. H. Yard, or H. H. Yard and the North California Mining Company.

From general reports it was learned that many of these claims were probably fraudulent in character. Upon the suggestion and request of the Forest Service, the Secretary of the Interior sent geologists from the Geological Survey to make an investigation of the claims. Shortly after the investigation the North California Mining Company, through H. H. Yard, its president, relinquished locations for 34,000 acres. In 1906 the geologists examined 25,000 acres of land involved in these alleged illegal locations, and reported 17,000 acres as certainly invalid for lack of mineral discovery, and a hearing was ordered by the Department of the Interior to determine the validity of these locations. A hearing involving 11,000 acres actually took place at the local land office at Susanville, Cal., in August, 1907. Upon this hearing, the local office found that the 11,000 acres were covered with 160,000,000 board feet of timber, valued at about $320,000, and that although the claims had been held by H. H. Yard and the North California Mining Company for from two to five years, there had been recovered only about $3 worth of gold, and this recovery was made during six weeks of prospecting, after the hearing had been ordered. The decision of the local officers declared every claim involved in the hearing invalid. The hearing, which will involve the remaining 6,000 acres which were reported invalid by the geologists, has not yet been had. The decision of the local office is on appeal before the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

No wonder these timber thieves are howling against the Forest Service; no wonder they are directing their shafts of hatred and misrepresentation against the Chief Forester.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The thought occurred to me in the discussion of the Johnesse affair and other matters as to why these locations were permitted and why this party in California was permitted to hold this land during the length of time he did hold it, because the law was just as efficient if it had been enforced without the forest reserve as it was with it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the trouble in the past has been that the examinations have not been made thoroughly. I do not altogether blame the Department for that, because Congress never gave them sufficient money to pay the expenses of examiners, and perhaps they have done just as well as they could under the circumstances. All the money they got they expended for that purpose; but many a claim went through without sufficient examination.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. Answering the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I would say that in my opinion if this appropriation should be cut down the very proposition as stated by him would be continued and exaggerated to such an extent that practically all the land in those two or three forest reserves that have been covered by placer mining claims will be located, and in some of the instances at least, if there are not investigations by the Department such as have been carried on in the past, patents will be issued, mining land will be turned over to these fraudulent locators, and timber cut from it, and the timber land that is now in the reserves will be turned over to these great corporations that have stolen practically every foot of timber in our State, and will now take the balance of it under these fraudulent placer claims.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. With pleasure.

Mr. BORAH. The suggestion which I made was not in the interest of cutting down this appropriation. I am not in favor of cutting down the appropriation.

Mr. FLINT. I understand that, but some here are.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. I simply suggested it in view of the proposition that the law is already, without any aid from the Forest Service, efficient and sufficient to protect that situation and that there need not be any stealing of land if the officials do their duty. The situation is that the local land officers and those who are in charge of this matter have sufficient power under the law to protect the public lands of this country if they perform their duty.

Mr. FLINT. I will ask the Senator from Idaho when an application for a patent is made and proof that there is gold or other mineral found in paying quantities is made, and the parties obtain a patent for the land, how would the Department know?

Mr. BORAH. Has not the Department the power, without any aid from the Forest Service, to make these examinations?

Mr. FLINT. They have no funds to make these investigations. It was not until the present Administration that these mining claims were investigated, even by the Interior Department.

Mr. BORAH. How do they protect the public lands which are not in the forest reserve?

Mr. FLINT. They do now have inspectors out there to ascertain when the application is made, but that has only been within a few years.

Mr. SMOOT. This is not a question of the Forest Service passing on mining or homestead claims. That is done by the General Land Office.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. TELLER. I want to just make the statement that in some of these cases the Department has been at the mercy of their inspectors. The most flagrant case that I know of was in the Northwest. Two inspectors reported in favor of a patent. It was found afterwards that they had been purchased by the robbers or thieves and they had made false reports. That was the most flagrant case that I know of. I believe there were twelve or fifteen and possibly more engaged in that transaction.

Mr. SMOOT. In the whole transaction?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, just a word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I merely want to say that the mistake which they make with reference to the inspector and the people on the land is in always presuming that the inspector is honest and presuming that the man upon the land is dishonest. The fact of the business is that there are just as many people engaged in taking up these lands who are absolutely honest and working from conviction as to the kind of land as there are inspectors in the field examining those people.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are more of them honest than dishonest, but when honest you never hear a word of complaint; when dishonest a howl immediately goes up when interfered with. Continuing along that line, I want to call the attention of the Senate to another case, and this one is in Colorado.

The Libby Placer Mining Company is seeking title to about 3,500 acres of land near Libby, Mont., under mineral applications. These lands have been examined by expert miners and are reported to have no mineral value, but to be covered by a growth of about 60,000,000 feet of timber, worth, approximately, $150,000. The lands lie in the Cabinet (N) national forest, and the said mining company is said to claim, under mineral locations, about 2,500 acres of additional land, or total of about 6,000 acres which is covered with a like growth of timber, for which they have not yet applied for patent. It is said that in the vicinity of Libby 16,000 acres of heavily timbered land of no mineral value are embraced in such claims. These claims are being vigorously contested by the officials of the Forest Service and the General Land Office. The hearing was ordered by the General Land Office. I want to say that I hope not only the Land Office, but every supervisor, every ranger or other Government official will fight all such mining locations with every power at his command.

Between July 1, 1907, and March 31, 1908, the Forest Service recommended 1,746 lode mining claims for patent and 362 for cancellation, and 111 placer claims for patent and 146 for cancellation.

In view of the H. H. Yard placer claims in the Plumas National Forest, California, the statement of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], that there can be no such thing as a fraudulent mining claim in intention, is not borne out by the facts. The Yard placer claims aggregated over 200,000 acres of valuable timber land.

Mr. TELLER. I never made any such statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I will let the RECORD speak for itself.

Mr. TELLER. What I did say was that there was very little inducement in the way of timber on those small claims. The frauds have never been in getting timber on lode claims. It has been in getting it on placer claims.

Mr. SMOOT. I know of a number of lode claims with an area of only 600 by 1,500 feet taken up for no other purpose than the timber.

Mr. TELLER. That was probably in Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I know of other places.

Mr. TELLER. Not in Colorado.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, what are the facts in relation to homestead entries in forest reserves? The law was passed June 11, 1906, authorizing those entries, and the record shows from that date to April 1, 1908, the following:

District.	Received.	Listed.	Rejected.	Withdrawn.	Canceled.	Pending.	Error in numbers.	Unexpired.	Area listed.
No. 1	1,650	477	506	89	34	68	39	437	56,672.34
2	1,215	604	122	90	18	28	25	328	61,387.409

4	549	210	86	13	24	16	6	194	42,984.49
5	332	93	68	8	11	11	15	126	7,190.51
6	1,895	391	776	58	61	77	39	493	39,170.799
Total	6,962	2,298	1,691	351	178	277	147	2,018	267,425.649

I notice by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] in his speech on Monday last brought up the claim of Mrs. Guay and others as showing how mandatory, how czarlike these rangers were in relation to locations within a forest reserve, and that the policy was to make it so unbearable that people would not locate within a reserve.

Upon inquiry I am informed that the case of Mrs. Amelia Guay, as stated in her letter to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], printed on page 5732 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 5, is one of the list of cases printed on page 5733 of the same RECORD, heretofore under investigation by the General Land Office.

There are thirty-nine cases in the list on page 5733. Of these cases the Forester has favorably recommended seventeen to the General Land Office for patent, and has recommended that entries in three of the cases be canceled, the evidence adduced warranting it. In seven of the cases he has merely asked the General Land Office to suspend action until reports can be secured establishing the character of the entries. In two cases there are no reports from the Forest Service and no action has been taken. In two of the seventeen cases recommended for patent the Commissioner has been asked temporarily to suspend action, one of the two being the case of Mrs. Guay, and it is probable that in both cases the original favorable recommendation will stand. The character and validity of nearly all the entries published in the list were first called to the attention of the General Land Office in reports by special agents as early as 1902. Reports were also made by special agents in 1904 and 1905, involving many, if not all, of these entries. The claims are all more or less heavily timbered.

Under the decisions of the Department of the Interior there must be no more pretense of cultivation of the land as required by law than a pretense of residence. (See Glomset, 36 Land Decisions, 255.)

In the case of homestead entries where proof is submitted after five years, and the land is covered with a heavy and valuable stand of timber and there has been but meager cultivation for the period of five years, say, of no more than a quarter of an acre, or one, or two, or three, and the land is far more valuable for timber than for agriculture, the question of the claimant's good faith arises and is properly a subject of investigation, especially in cases where an attempt is made to dispose of the timber shortly after final proof.

Let us see about this Guay family. I find here No. 27, Joseph Guay, jr. I find in the same list No. 33, George Guay. I find in the same list No. 37, William R. Guay. I find in this same list No. 38, John Guay. I find in the same list No. 13, Joseph Guay, sr.

I read Mrs. Guay's letter, addressed to the Senator from Idaho, with a great deal of care. Mind you, Mr. President, I find that it is not altogether a complaint of the Forest Service, but if the language is to be taken as it is written, she has a complaint from another source. Let us see what it is.

> We have for several years been annoyed and threatened in various ways by representatives of lumber companies and forest rangers and representatives of the Forestry Service, who have represented to us that we couldn't get title to our homes because there was timber on the land which the lumber companies wanted.
> The settlers believe that you are not influenced by the timber interests, and I am writing you in the hope that you may see that justice is done us and that our homes may not be taken away from us.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. As these people are constituents of mine, I should like to ask the Senator what point he makes that there were several Guays in this filing.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to make the point that the Guays and the whole lot of complainants as named in the bunch of complaints submitted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] came from one section of the country, from Ashland, Wis., and no doubt all with the same purpose in view, and I could tell the Senator the history of denuding the forests around Ashland and the effect it has had upon the place, if necessary.

I do not object to one Guay or five Guays locating land there, but what have the timber barons or the great timber interests to do with Mr. Guay's homestead entry? Mr. President, if report has it correct, if certain agreements were carried out, the timber interests would have a special interest in Mrs. Guay's homestead entry; and mind you, Mr. President, I have not the testimony to show that the report is absolutely true, but it has the earmarks of truth in connection with the Guay letter.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely suggest that it is the timber barons in our country who are in favor of the creation of forest reserves, and it is the homestead settlers who are opposed to the method under which they are now being conducted.

Mr. SMOOT. I have here a number of petitions from citizens of Idaho, asking the extension of certain reserves. They are not timber barons, either.

Mr. HEYBURN. I called attention the other day to the fact that the vice-president of the national association is Mr. Weyerhauser, who is the largest timber owner in the world.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. Weyerhauser has all the timber he needs, and perhaps he does not want anybody else to get in the same position.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator has struck the keynote of the whole situation. He has. Mr. Weyerhauser has all the timber he needs, and if he can shut off every other milling enterprise he will have the biggest monopoly in the world.

Mr. SMOOT. If the timber is in forest reserves every citizen in Idaho has the same chance to purchase it, and therefore no monopoly can be created as long as the reserves are controlled by the Government.

Mr. BORAH. Were these filings by the Guays made under the timber and stone act?

Mr. SMOOT. They are homestead entries.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. With pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. In reply to the senior Senator from Idaho, I simply want to say that the question of Mr. Weyerhauser's holdings in relation to the lands included within forest reserves has been brought up a number of times. If, as a matter of fact, there was passed to-day a law repealing the law creating the forest reserves, it would be only a very short time before the same dishonest practices that were carried on for years and years, and which were the basis of the holdings of all these large timber owners, would continue from now on, as there has not been a repeal of a single statute under which all these fraudulent timber entries have been made, although there has been an effort made by some of us in the Congress of the United States to repeal the laws under which these various fraudulent acquisitions of public land have been made.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I simply wish to ask the Senator from California under what law they would proceed to do this—under the stone and timber act?

Mr. FLINT. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I merely wish to say one word, heartily indorsing what the Senator from California has said. The main effort of Mr. Pinchot, as Chief Forester, and of the men associated with him has been to preserve the public domain for the home seekers and to protect it from absorption by monopolistic corporations. Repeatedly during the last six years the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior have urged upon the Congress the reform of the land laws with a view to prevent the absorption of the public domain in large holdings. Such absorption has been going on for many years, and the recommendation of the President and of the Secretary of the Interior has not been complied with by Congress. It is largely due to the fact that these great spoliative interests are strongly intrenched in the political organization of every State in the West, and they are as influential and powerful there as the monopolies elsewhere are powerful in legislation. They have prevented reform in this direction.

So far as I am concerned I wish to say that Mr. Pinchot has moved along in a quiet, modest, unobtrusive, nonsensational way, having steadily in view the preservation of this great domain to the vast mass of the people. Everything that he has stood for has been democratic in character. He has stood there to protect the rights of home seekers and to protect future generations in the rights that belong to them—of settling upon those lands. I think he should receive commendation instead of criticism.

Mr. SMOOT. I think so, too, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Nothing I have said has been intended to be a criticism of the character of the work of Mr. Pinchot, but I do say that the rules and regulations in reference to the manner in which these reserves are to be used are an impediment to the development of a large portion of our State. I do not say it is the fault of Mr. Pinchot, but it is certainly the fault of Congress that these things are not changed, because the law-making power of this Government rests with us, and there should never be given to any Department the power to make rules and regulations, the decision of which is absolutely conclusive against a citizen.

Mr. SMOOT. The rules and regulations as to the examination of an entryman on a forest reserve are not left finally to the decision of the Forester. And why attack this division on that ground?

Mr. BORAH. I do not attack this division alone on that ground, but I do say with this Department and with other Departments of the Government there has been growing up in the last twenty-five years a claim that they can make rules and regulations, the violation of which constitutes a crime; and that is absolutely at war with every theory of republican institutions.

Mr. SMOOT. I prefer to go on now, Mr. President.

The other case referred to by the Senator from Idaho was that of J. A. Parker, and it seems to me that the answer of the Forester, Hon. Gifford Pinchot, to the Senator himself, was a complete answer to Mr. Parker's letter to him. Who is Mr. Parker? I notice from the letter to the Senator that he is the kind of a man who says of himself:

I dare to say that I have done more for the West and this nation than any other man living in it to-day and got less for my services.

Mr. NELSON. Who is that?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. Parker. He has done more for the nation than any other man who lives in it.

Mr. NELSON. Who is this Mr. Parker?

Mr. SMOOT. He is one of the complainants. He is a man who went out to Idaho and located on a forest reserve, and because, forsooth, he made a location in error, locating on one piece of land when his selection was for another, he claims that the Forest Service is depriving and robbing him of his rights.

Mr. BORAH. Do you know where Mr. Parker comes from?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know, and it has nothing to do with the case.

Mr. BORAH. It might have if you would trace him back to where he does come from.

Mr. SMOOT. It would not, so far as this argument is concerned. I have taken some interest——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me the Senator ought not to have brought in that matter. It is a reflection on the Senate for any man to come here and pretend that he has done more for the country than anybody else.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. May I ask the Senator if he knows Mr. Parker?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not know Mr. Parker.

Mr. President, I have taken some little interest in finding out the relinquishments that have been made in certain forest reserves and the reasons why they were compelled to relinquish. Let me read you the relinquishments in one forest reserve. I wish the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] were present, because the forest reserve is located in his section of the country:

CASES RELINQUISHED WITHIN RAINIER NATIONAL FOREST.

Bell J. Dermody, H. E. 2990, Olympia L. D. (No report from Forest Service.) Abandoned.

Francis G. Hanson, H. E. 3022, Olympia L. D. Relinquishment executed before forest officer. Eight million feet B. M. on claim.

Frank D. Stephenson, H. E. 2998, Olympia, L. D. Relinquished before Forest Officer F. F. Spark. About 7,000,000 feet B. M. on claim.

Mr. FLINT. I should like to ask the Senator, as he goes along, if he can state whether, in any of these cases where persons have filed such homestead entries, they cut any timber from the claim before they relinquished it?

Mr. SMOOT. They may have cut some timber from them for their own purpose. But that was not the object of the location. The object was to locate the land under the homestead law, commute it, and sell it for the timber that was on it. I do not wish to take the time of the Senate to designate the names and number of each case in each particular reserve, but I ask that I may be allowed to put the information into the RECORD. I will state, however, that these twenty-three relinquishments were in one forest reserve, with a total board measure of 158,500,000 feet of timber upon them.

The matter referred to is as follows:

George J. Steuben, H. E. 2992, Olympia L. D. Copy of relinquishment forwarded by forest officer. About 9,000,000 feet B. M. on claim	9, 000, 000
Edward Werren, squatter, Olympia L. D. About 11,000,000 feet B. M. on claim	11, 000, 000
Mary E. Pringle, H. E. 2989, Olympia L. D. About 4,000,000 feet B. M.	4, 000, 000
O. W. Vaughn, H. E. 2986, Olympia L. D. Relinquished before forest officer. About 7,000,000 feet B. M.	7, 000, 000
William Ball, squatter, Olympia L. D. Copy of relinquishment forwarded by forest officer. 5,000,000 feet B. M.	5, 000, 000
B. B. Todd, H. E. 2987, Olympia L. D. Relinquishment witnessed by A. L. Thayer and forwarded by forest officer. About 7,000,000 feet B. M.	7, 000, 000
Frank O. Watson, squatter, Olympia L. D. Claim abandoned. About 8,000,000 feet B. M.	8, 000, 000
John A. McKinnon, H. E. 3027, Olympia L. D. Copy of relinquishment forwarded by forest officer; witnessed by A. L. Thayer. 8,000,000 feet B. M.	8, 000, 000
R. A. Wilson, H. E. 3026, Olympia L. D. Copy of relinquishment witnessed by A. L. Thayer, forwarded by forest officer. About 8,000,000 feet B. M.	8, 000, 000
Rufus L. Sherrill, H. E. 3025, Olympia L. D. Relinquishment witnessed by A. L. Thayer; copy forwarded by forest officer. About 3,500,000 feet B. M.	3, 500, 000
John E. Raught, squatter, Olympia L. D. Application withdrawn. About 8,000,000 feet B. M.	8, 000, 000
John O. Jensen, H. E. 2964, Olympia L. D. Copy of relinquishment forwarded by forest officer; witnessed by A. L. Thayer. About 8,000,000 feet B. M.	8, 000, 000
John Senn, H. E. 2966, Olympia L. D. About 8,000,000 feet B. M. Copy of relinquishment forwarded by forest officer; witnessed by A. L. Thayer	8, 000, 000
Miss Lucy Chapman, H. E. 2997, Olympia L. D. Original relinquishment in this case filed by Acting Supervisor Park in the local land office February 24, 1908. About 3,000,000 feet B. M.	3, 000, 000
Thomas McIntyre, H. E. 3020, Olympia L. D. Relinquishment witnessed by A. L. Thayer and forwarded by forest officer. About 6,000,000 feet B. M.	6, 000, 000
Joseph M. Sherrill, H. E. 3023, Olympia L. D. Copy of relinquishment forwarded by Forest Officer A. L. Thayer. 3,000,000 feet B. M.	3, 000, 000
Mary M. Vaughn, H. E. 3000, Olympia L. D. Relinquishment witnessed by A. L. Thayer and copy forwarded by forest officer. About 4,000,000 feet	4, 000, 000
Silas E. Baker, H. E. 2988, Olympia L. D. Relinquishment witnessed by A. L. Thayer and forwarded by forest officer. About 8,000,000 feet B. M.	8, 000, 000
John C. Watson, squatter, Olympia L. D. A. L. Thayer, examiner of claims, reported relinquishment March 30, 1908. About 8,000,000 feet B. M.	8, 000, 000
James F. Sherrill, H. E. 3001, Olympia L. D. Relinquishment witnessed by Thayer and copy forwarded by forest officer. About 10,000,000 feet B. M.	10, 000, 000
Hans D. Schlotfeldt, H. E. 2995, Olympia L. D. About 6,000,000 feet B. M. Relinquishment witnessed by A. L. Thayer and copy forwarded by forest officer	6, 000, 000
Total	158, 500, 000

COQUILLE NATIONAL FOREST.

Joseph Olson. S. S. No. 8591. Cancellation due to efforts of forest officers. Canceled for failure to make final proof March 26, 1908. Almost a complete burn, only a few green trees on claim.
Edmund K. Chaffey. T. and S. No. 8738. Cancellation due to efforts of forest officers. Canceled for failure to make final proof March 26, 1908; 2,000,900 feet B. M.	2, 000, 000
Bernard Brewer. T. and S. (number not given). Canceled by local land office for failure to make final proof. 1,500,000 feet B. M.	1, 500, 000
Orton Glen. T. and S. No. 8228. Canceled by the local office for failure to make final proof; 1,500,000 feet B. M	1, 500, 000
Total feet B. M.	5, 000, 000

The above cases would undoubtedly have been proved up on, and in all probability patent would have issued, but for reports by forest officers. It is a pity these high-toned timber thieves have been interfered with.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. FLINT. I desire to ask the Senator if from any investigation he has made he has determined whether or not the parties who had made the applications for homesteads and commuted would have perfected their entries and the lands would have passed from the Government to the various applicants if it had not been for the system now carried on by Mr. Pinchot and the Forestry Service of having the various entries examined to ascertain the facts as to the condition of the land in each case?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt at all in my mind of it. They did it in years past, time and time and time again; and if the system of the past had not been changed, the same thing would have happened in these very claims upon this very land.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand the Senator to refer to some of these particular homestead entrymen in Idaho as being land thieves?

Mr. SMOOT. This is not in Idaho. This is the Rainier Forest Reserve.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is in the State of Washington.

Mr. SMOOT. An article in the Washington Evening Star of Monday, April 20, 1908, entitled "Sales of public documents," and describing the work of the superintendent of documents, contains the following statement:

Over 700,000 volumes have the past year been reclaimed from the 300 carloads of "junk" accumulated through departmental and library cleanups, and many tons of the useless books have been sent to the L street warehouse to await condemnation. Formerly the upper floors of the old Printing Office building were loaded with huge piles of this miscellaneous rubbish, but now those volumes suitable for preservation, distribution, or sale are carefully filed in huge stacks in the seven-story annex to the old building. It is expected that the entire documents office will be safely housed in this fireproof annex by the 1st of July, although the rearrangement of elevators and entrances will not be finished for some months.

The Forest Service goes on the principle that Government publications ought to be printed not in order to be stored by the hundred carloads in the Government Printing Office, but in order to be read. This means that (1) they must be readable, and (2) that they must find readers.

The Forest Service puts its publications into readable form for whatever class of readers the subject-matter is intended. Such technical bulletins as are prepared for the use of specialists are given the necessary technical form and sent only to specialists. But information which can help ordinary, average citizens is put into the shape which will best bring it home to such citizens, and when the publication appears the Forest Service does its best to see that the man who can use it gets it.

Most of the publications issued by the Forest Service cost but a small fraction of a cent a copy. These cheap publications are printed in editions of scores and even hundreds of thousands, and distributed by means of a special mailing list. This mailing list is classified both by States and by occupations or predominant interest in forestry. Thus, for example, a publication written especially for farmers in New England can be readily mailed to them, without making it necessary to send them another intended for lumbermen in the Lake States or for engineers all over the country.

Until within the last two years the Forest Service publications were generally illustrated bulletins, usually from thirty to eighty pages long, and costing on the average about 10 cents apiece. The usual edition was 10,000. The cost of 10,000 press bulletins at 10 cents apiece pays for an edition of 500,000 circulars at one-fifth of a cent apiece.

Thus it will be seen that the Forest Service publication policy aims at securing the widest possible circulation of useful information at the minimum of expense.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am much interested in the figures the Senator is producing, and I should like to know the difference between the cost. He says the bulletin costs 10 cents and something else costs so much. I should like to know the difference between the cost of the two publications that diffuse the same knowledge.

Mr. SMOOT. I can show the Senator the difference. I have it here. One is a bulletin perhaps of half a dozen pages and printed in bulletin form, perhaps 6 by 9 or 5 by 7. The other is a sheet of paper that is got out here in a form comprising perhaps not more than one sheet, and it is distributed daily to all the newspapers of the country that desire to receive the same.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator was making a comparison in price between the bulletin and the sheet. I ask him if he thinks that is a just comparison?

Mr. SMOOT. I was simply trying to show that through the modern system of getting information throughout the country the Forestry Division is following a policy that reaches millions where the old policy of publishing a bulletin reached only hundreds.

Mr. FLINT. And at much less cost.

Mr. SMOOT. And at much less cost.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then, do I understand that the publications of this Department on the same subject-matter, containing the same amount of information, can be given out in a sheet of one page that heretofore has required bulletins of ten or twelve pages?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no, Mr. President; that is not the idea I intended to convey.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I so gathered from the Senator's comparison of the expense.

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose if the Senator had waited until I had finished with the explanation he would have understood me better. There is now only an expense of about $7,000 for preparing these articles, and with that $7,000 the publications as prepared reach perhaps twenty-three or twenty-five million readers during a month. I have here a daily sheet of the information prepared for the month of March. The papers asked for the information, and from the returns that have been received by the Department it is shown that at least 23,000,000 readers were reached during that month.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think the Department is to be congratulated upon reaching so many readers, but as a matter of further information, I want to know if the Senate is to understand from the statement the Senator now makes that six or seven thousand dollars is the entire amount that is used in diffusing the information for the Forestry Service.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the entire amount, and I did not intend to convey that idea to the Senate, but I did say that that is the amount that was paid for the preparation of these daily bulletins.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator did not convey that idea to the Senator from Wyoming, and the Senator from Wyoming is asking for information and nothing else.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, that is the information I have to give to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask the Senator, who has investigated this matter very closely, as I observe, if he can give us the figures as to the cost of the information per annum sent out by the Bureau?

Mr. SMOOT. Exclusive, I will say to the Senator, of the printing charges.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Everything.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not say as to the exact cost of the printing charges, nor can anyone else, because they do not know how many copies will be printed, but I can state that the total cost in all the branches of the Department for all the editorial work and for all the collection of information that goes out in the bulletins does not exceed $17,500 a year.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am exceedingly unfortunate in asking my question. What I am trying to get at is the cost of spreading the information of the Forestry Service.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, sir; and that is the cost outside of the actual expense of the printing of the bulletins. It does not cost the Service one cent for the circulation of this information by the papers and magazines of the country. All the cost is $17,500, and I say to the Senator now——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is all the cost?

Mr. SMOOT. That is all the cost, outside of the expense of printing. The printing of the bulletins is done by the Government Printing Office.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Can the Senator give us an idea as to what that amounts to?

Mr. SMOOT. I said I could not, and no one else can do it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It certainly can be done, because the Government Printing Office renders regular bills to each Department.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will say I am not able to state what the cost has been.

Striking evidence of the fact that Forest Service publications are useful to the public is furnished by the annual reports of the superintendent of documents. Though the service distributes its publications free so widely, more than six times as many Forest Service publications were sold by the superintendent of documents last year as in any previous year.

The superintendent of documents sells more publications of the Forest Service than of any other bureau in the Government, and more than of any Department except Agriculture, of which it is a bureau. The number of Forest Service publications sold in the fiscal year 1907 was 15,558, and the amount received was $2,301.15.

It is sometimes charged that the Forest Service publishes a monthly magazine laudatory of its work. This is presumably due to the fact that the American Forestry Association, a private organization with headquarters in Washington, publishes the magazine Forestry and Irrigation. This is absolutely independent of the Forest Service. The Service issues a monthly Field Program, no doubt each Senator is familiar with it, but this is published purely for the use of members of the Service and contains only official orders, notices, assignments of work, and similar matters.

Mr. President, I have here a sample of the Field Program for April, 1908, also the daily bulletins of information for the month of March, 1908. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate in reading these, but I do believe that it would be an advantage to know just what sort of information is being given to the country, and I ask that permission be given that I may insert these bulletins in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Forest Service publicity matter given out during month of March, 1908.

ARGENTINE REPUBLIC TO PROTECT FORESTS.

South America is beginning to show the world that she recognizes the value of her natural resources by taking up the question of forest preservation. The Republic of Colombia has already outlined a forest policy, and now the people of the Argentine Republic have taken up the discussion of forestry and its application to the management of the country's rich hard-wood timber areas.

Up to the present time the subject of forestry has received but little consideration in the various South American states. Most of these countries have large areas of forested land, but owing to the fact that they are so remotely situated and that they are composed mainly of broad-leaf species, which are too hard for ordinary building and construction lumber, and hence not in very great demand, they have not as yet been extensively lumbered. As an illustration of this might be cited the fact that the small country of France furnishes more saw material than does the whole of South America.

Wasteful exploitation of the forests of the Argentine Republic is increasing, however, and their wanton destruction is beginning to attract attention there. So far the destruction of valuable fruit trees has received more attention than that of forest trees. The following is a quotation from an article which recently appeared in La Nacion, and was translated by the Buenos Aires Herald:

"It is not only in the province of Buenos Aires that the ancient tree plantations are being destroyed; the evil has spread to the remotest inhabited corners of the Republic. In a recent journey to and through the provinces of the interior I have found on every hand the effects of the savagely reckless felling of timber and the censurable carelessness of the authorities who allow it. The destruction is general; the finest specimens of our indigenous trees have been ruthlessly sacrificed, not only those of spontaneous growth, but also those planted by our ancestors on behalf of their posterity.

"To make a beginning of my discomforting recital, I will first mention that in La Rioja this senseless war against nature has laid low large plantations of magnificent and highly productive orange trees, the fruit of which is vastly superior to the importation from Paraguay here consumed. Had these trees been properly cultivated the province would now possess a source of wealth which would have spared it the shame of going a-begging from the national budget.

"In Mendoza the olive trees, cultivated as far back as two hundred years ago by the Jesuits, have completely disappeared. There, however, be it said with satisfaction, there are men of the stamp of Civit, Seru, and others like them, who are busied with plantations that promise to make good the loss. In San Juan the felling has been stupidly prodigal, with the result that not even half of the plantations remain which thirty years ago tempered its torrid climate and beautified its valleys.

"In Santiago del Estero, Salta, Catamarca, and Jujuy there are signs of the same barbaric destruction which, unless it is arrested, will soon leave those provinces as bare as a maize field that has been ravaged by the locusts.

"As for Tucuman, the Tucuman of poetic legends mentioned by Avellaneda, it is to-day almost unrecognizable. It would no longer be true to repeat his words where he says: 'The orange and lemon tree, which produce in rich abundance flowers and fruit, perfuming the ambient air, feeding the inhabitants and affording them a house and a home, are most beloved by them as the emblem of the felicitous union of the useful and the beautiful.' No; even the famous and magnificent orange trees of the city plaza have disappeared to make way for more pretentious plants that, unfit for the climate and inappropriate for the spot, cut the feeble and sorry figure of weazened and sapless consumptives."

From the destruction of the fruit orchards to that of the forests is but a step, and the people are already waking up to the fact that they must take measures to protect their enormous and valuable forest resources. The work of the United States Government along this line is attracting attention there and is being watched with considerable interest.

One writer points out the laws of the United States, Canada, and British India, and commenting on the fact that the usefulness of forests is now admitted, goes on to state that the lack of suitable forestry laws to prevent the wasteful exploitation of the forests will, if continued, witness the total destruction of the immense forests of valuable woods of the Republic. So far the damage done is comparatively slight. The enormous lumber resources of the country are, with few exceptions, as yet practically untouched, and the Argentine has a splendid opportunity to show its wisdom and foresightedness in this matter by taking action before it is too late. The progress of the forestry movement there will certainly be watched with great interest in this country.

BIRCH IS VALUABLE, BUT LITTLE KNOWN.

The paper birch is a tree to which the average person seldom has more than a passing introduction. The summer visitor often gains a fair acquaintance with its bark and learns that it is used for making canoes, baskets, and similar ornamental and useful articles. In some places the wood also supplies the local demand for fuel. Outside of these uses the public has little knowledge of the practical value of the birch. As a matter of fact it is an exceedingly important wood in a number of wood-working industries, and there are certain articles for the manufacture of which no satisfactory substitute has yet been found.

The most important of these minor industries which are dependent upon paper birch is the spool industry. Practically every spool used in this country is made from this species alone. In the neighborhood of 20,000,000 feet of it, board measure, are cut every year for this purpose, and of this about 4,000,000 feet are shipped to England in the form of spool bars for use over there. Insignificant as a spool may seem, its manufacture is by no means an easy task. From the tiny spools holding only 200 yards of thread to the large, three-piece ones holding 12,000 yards there is an almost innumerable variety of shapes and sizes. Yet each of these types must have every single spool belonging to it precisely identical. In order that the thread may afterwards be wound upon the spools without difficulty, accuracy in manufacture is a prime requisite. This necessity has led to the invention of a number of very ingenious automatic machines which not only turn the spool with great accuracy, but also with great speed, some of them at a rate of a spool a second.

In order that all of the spools of a particular type may be absolutely uniform, the wood must be thoroughly seasoned before it is used, and it must also be of some species which holds its shape after it has once been seasoned. Paper birch possesses this quality to a large degree, and this is one thing which adapts it so well to spool manufacture. Another thing is the fact that it is hard enough not to be easily dented, while at the same time it is not too hard to work easily. It is a wood particularly adapted to all sorts of lathe work, and this is perhaps its most important qualification, since it turns readily and presents a clean, smooth surface. Various other woods have been tried as substitutes for it, as well as pulp and sawdust, consolidated by hydraulic pressure, but none of these have as yet proved satisfactory.

Still another industry which uses nothing but paper birch is that of the manufacture of shoe pegs and shoe shanks. These are used quite largely in this country in making the cheaper grades of shoes. They are also exported to quite an extent to foreign countries, principally to Germany and Japan. The industry does not consume so much wood as the spool industry, but it is nevertheless an important one in the Northeast, and helps to make inroads into the forest.

The toothpick is still another article for which the paper birch is used almost exclusively. Perhaps it may seem to some that so small an article as the toothpick can not consume very much wood. In comparison with many other things, this is relatively true, of course; yet a single mill in Maine uses 2,000 cords of birch every year for this purpose alone. Quite recently shipments of toothpicks to England, France, and Germany have begun to be made, and this is now an important part of the industry.

The dowel and novelty mills also use paper birch very largely in their work, although many of these also use other hard woods to a limited extent. The bobbin and shuttle manufacturers may also be included in this same class, which all together consumes nearly as much paper birch as the spool industry.

Still another very interesting peculiarity of these industries, particularly of the three first mentioned, is that they not only confine themselves to paper birch, but that they are also limited almost entirely to a very small section of the country, Maine and eastern New Hampshire. Although paper birch is one of the few North American trees with a transcontinental range, being found from Newfoundland and Labrador on the east to Alaska on the west, it occurs in the United States only along the northern border, and is most abundant and most accessible in the extreme Northeast. Maine in particular is the great paper birch State, and here large tracts of it in almost pure stands are found. This is due to the fact that the birch readily takes possession of land that has been burnt over, and the great Miramichi fire in 1825, together with other similar fires of about that same period, gave it a chance to obtain quite a foothold there.

Unfortunately the paper birch is a short-lived tree and becomes red-hearted quite early in life, so that many of these stands are now overmature and ought to be cut at once. The red heart is inferior wood and can not be used except for the cheapest grade of spools and novelties, so that these old stands are constantly decreasing in value. The birch near the railroads has also been very largely cut out, and the lumbermen are having to go far back to get the necessary supply. In the case of these species, as well as practically all others in the country, the decreasing supply is beginning to make itself felt, and conservation in its use must be practiced if the woodworking industries now dependent upon it are to continue.

PORTO RICAN NATIONAL FOREST TO BE PUT UNDER ADMINISTRATION.

WASHINGTON, February —, 1908.

Porto Rico will soon have its only national forest under administration. Mr. M. Rothkugel, of the United States Forest Service, has just sailed from New York for the island to make a study of forest conditions and outline a plan of management of the Loquillo National Forest.

The Loquillo is the only national forest in the insular possessions of the United States, and while it was created in 1903, provisions for its administration were not made until early in January, when the Comptroller of the Treasury affirmed the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture over the forest.

The forest takes in a little less than 66,000 acres, and is located in the northeastern part of the island. Mr. Rothkugel, who goes to make the plan of its administration and study its forest conditions, is eminently fitted for the work, having had long experience in forest work, both for the Government and for private corporations. Mr. Rothkugel, on reaching Porto Rico, will confer with Governor Post, who has been exceedingly anxious that the forest be put under early administration. He will spend three months studying conditions and making his plans, and will report to Forester Gifford Pinchot.

While in Porto Rico he will select and appoint native rangers, picking men who have a thorough knowledge of forest conditions in Porto Rico. This is in keeping with the Government's policy of putting all national forests under administration of local officers.

Many of the laws governing the regulation of the national forests in this country will not apply to Porto Rico forests, because of the different conditions. It is expected that the Loquillo National Forest will be put under actual administration next fall, by which time the details of Forest Agent Rothkugel's plans will have been worked out and approved by the forest officers in Washington.

WHITE FIR AS A PULP WOOD.

On the Pacific coast, especially in Oregon and California, there is an immense amount of white fir (Abies concolor) timber now going to waste for lack of some commercially profitable means of disposing of it. At present it is very little used for lumber, and since it is not cut to any extent its proportion in the forest tends to increase at the expense of other and more valuable trees.

Experiments conducted at the Forest Service laboratory at Washington show that this wood is admirably adapted for the production of paper pulp by the sulphite process. The wood is found to yield very readily to the action of the sulphite liquors used, which are of the usual commercial strength, viz, about 4 per cent total sulphur dioxide, 1 per cent combined and 3 per cent available. The length of treatment has varied in the different tests from eight to ten hours and the steam pressure from 60 to 75 pounds. These pressures correspond to maximum temperatures of 153° to 160° C.

The pulp produced in these experiments is from nearly white to light brown in color, according to the variations in the method of cooking, and by selecting the proper conditions of treatment it would be readily possible to produce a grade of fiber which could be used in many kinds of paper without the least bleaching. If, however, it is desired to employ the fiber for white book or writing papers, it could be readily bleached to a good white color. Results of laboratory tests show that the bleach required to bring the fiber up to the usual color for bleached sulphite spruce fiber is from 15 to 23 per cent to the weight of unbleached fiber—that is, assuming the bleaching powder to contain 35 per cent available chlorine. Sulphite spruce fiber now on the market requires from 175 to 500 pounds of 35 per cent bleach per ton of product, or from 9 to 24 per cent of the unbleached fiber. It is seen, therefore, that so far as bleaching is concerned the pulp made from white fir is just as good as that made from spruce.

The yields obtained in these experiments ranged from 43 to 49 per cent on the bone-dry basis. This is exclusive of screenings, which in no case exceed 1¼ per cent of the dry wood used. From careful observation of the methods employed in determining the yields it seems probable that these figures will be increased slightly when larger quantities of wood are used, and it is believed that in the matter of yield the fir wood is fully equal to spruce.

The fiber from these cooks is in most cases light colored and somewhat lustrous, and the sheets formed from it, without any beating, are remarkably tough and strong. Microscopic examination and measurements show that the fibers are of very remarkable length, being from one-half to two-thirds as long again as the commercial sulphite spruce fiber.

It is believed from the results that, so far as the product is concerned, the manufacture of fiber from white fir would be a commercial success and that the fiber produced would find its greatest usefulness in the production of manilas where great strength is required and in tissues which need very long fibers. It seems probable also that it would make very good news paper, for which purpose its naturally light color would particularly adapt it.

ARBOR DAY.

MARCH 4, 1908.

Arbor Day should have as wide significance as possible to be of the greatest value to the nation. The term should connote knowledge of trees and plants, the care of trees and wood lots, the improvement of homes and school grounds by planting trees, the value of trees for the protection of the home, the planting of trees to produce material for the farm, and to augment the waning supply of timber.

Every child in the United States should know the native trees that grow near his home place, as well as how they grow and how they are reproduced by seeds or sprouts.

In the Northeastern and Lake States the glory of the pines has gone and most of the timber lands are now waste. White pine is being planted in this region by States and individuals, with sure prospect of money return for the next generation and increased land values as well as returns for the present generation. New York State alone has reforested 2,000 acres in the Adirondacks within a very short time.

Railroads in the East are cutting the forests carefully and planting mountain sides, because ties are getting scarce. Coal companies are planting trees to produce mining props—species such as oak, chestnut, European larch, locust, etc., always the trees suited to the place where they are to be planted.

Farmers in the wind-swept Middle West and out on the open irrigation projects are setting out shelter belts and wood lots to protect their homes and to grow fence posts and farm-repair material. The fastest-growing species in use are cottonwood and Norway poplar, and if treated with preservatives last well in the ground as posts. European larch, catalpa, locust, osage orange, and other trees produce durable crops, and three or four rows of pines and spruce form a dense shelter belt which gives protection for homes and crops the year round.

In southern California the whole country is dotted with groves of eucalyptus, that wonderful tropical tree adapted only to this State, and one which has such rapid growth that within a few years good-size trees are grown.

Finally, children should know that Uncle Sam is planting thousands of trees annually on deforested lands in the national forests, for the distinct purpose of improving the stream flow, so that cities and towns may have better water and more of it, and always to conserve the water for the immense irrigation projects which require it.

The principal species which the Government is planting are Douglas fir, yellow pine, Jeffrey pine, incense cedar, etc.

LANDS ELIMINATED FROM NEW MEXICO NATIONAL FOREST.

WASHINGTON, March 4, 1908.

The President has just signed a proclamation eliminating 109,312 acres from the Lincoln National Forest, in Lincoln County, N. Mex. This reduces the area of the forest to 518,123 acres. This elimination is in accordance with the established policy of the Forest Service to eliminate all lands from the national forests which are not chiefly valuable for forest purposes.

The lands which have been eliminated from the Lincoln Forest include a considerable amount of the valuable agricultural lands in townships 9 and 10 south, range 13 east, along Magoda, Rio Bonito, and Little Eagle creeks. The title to nearly all of this class of land has already passed from the Government, and its elimination will simplify the administration of the forest. A block of approximately 10,000 acres south and west of the town of Lincoln and a large area east of the Capitan Mountains is included in this elimination.

The towns of White Oak and Nogal have also been thrown out of the forest by this proclamation, along with all the open land on the flats at the base of the mountains. This elimination will not affect the watersheds of any important streams, for the reason that it lies along the base of the mountains and forms only a very small portion of the drainage basin of any one stream.

TREES AS CROPS.

"It is as sure that forest land can be made to grow successive crops of trees under proper methods as that plow land can be made to grow successive crops of wheat," says the Secretary of Agriculture in the part of his annual report wherein he speaks of the national forests.

This country, which once could boast of forest resources richer than any other nation in the world, has been cutting three times as much timber for a number of years as there is grown, and the consideration of timber as a crop to be carefully harvested has come at a time when many of the virgin forests are already depleted. Continuing, Secretary Wilson says in part:

"Just as American farming has had to develop and is still developing methods adapted to the conditions of each region to make the best use of the agricultural lands, so must the forester learn by scientific study and practical trial to make the best use of our timber land. And the best use means, of course, not merely its best use for the growing of trees, but its best use with reference to all interests directly or indirectly affected by it.

"As time passes, it will doubtless appear that the principles which centuries of experience in older countries have placed at our command can be applied with increasing good results as we grow more familiar with our own special conditions. The issue is sharply between caring for our forests by applying a system of known efficiency or suffering certain loss, not only of the forests but of usable water and soil as well, through the operation of causes as certain to act as are the rivers to run to the sea."

The Forest Service now has administration over more than 164,000,000 acres of land. This is slightly more than one-fifth of the country's total forested area; the remainder is in the hands of private owners. Nearly all the timber land of the unappropriated public domain is now in the national forests. This means that it is being protected against fire, theft, and wasteful exploitation, that its power to grow wood and store water is being safeguarded for all time, and that, nevertheless, its present supply of useful material is open to immediate use whenever it is wanted. The report says:

"The timber in the national forests, which is the legacy of the growth of centuries, is now in the truest sense public property, administered for the benefit of the people—primarily for the benefit of the people of the West, since they are nearest at hand, but on the whole for the benefit of every part of the country, since the welfare of every section is interwoven with that of all others. The communities and settlers adjacent to the forests are safe from any fear of monopoly of one of the chief necessities of civilized man."

The Secretary tells interestingly of how the Government manages its timber lands as a trustee. It gives timber away through free-use permits in small quantities to the actual home maker who comes to develop the country, and in larger quantities to communities for public purposes. Its system of management is vastly different from that of a landlord. When large quantities of timber are harvested from the national forests, sales are made to the highest bidder, but under such restrictions as look to the maintenance of a lasting supply answering to the needs of the locality, to be had without favoritism and without extortionate demand based upon the necessity of the consumer.

FOREST SERVICE NOTES.

WASHINGTON, March 6, 1908.

Arizona.—The following forest guards have been appointed on Arizona national forests: Donald P. Johnston, on the Verde National Forest; W. E. Rogers, on the Tonto National Forest; Thomas L. Mercer, on the Verde National Forest; Asa Bogarth, on the Prescott National Forest.

Arkansas.—William E. Mershan and Alvin B. Highfell have been appointed forest guards on the Arkansas National Forest.

Colorado.—James L. Blackburn has been appointed a forest guard on the Park Range National Forest, Colo.

Oklahoma.—Herbert Hodge has been appointed an assistant forest ranger and A. H. Edwards a forest guard on the Wichita National Forest.

New Mexico.—C. H. Shinn has been appointed a forest guard (hunter and trapper) on the Gila (N) National Forest.

Utah.—The following assistant forest rangers have been appointed: George P. Low and Bert L. Robins, on the Fillmore National Forest; Will M. Irons, on the Monticello National Forest.

Montana.—Charles M. Hains has been appointed forest guard on the Lewis and Clark (S) National Forest, and George Gardener on the Cabinet (S) National Forest.

LECTURES ON FORESTRY BEFORE FARMERS' INSTITUTES.

WASHINGTON, March 6, 1908.

C. A. Kupfer, of the office of extension, United States Forest Service, has just left Washington for Kansas, where he will be engaged for two weeks beginning Monday, March 9, in connection with the regular farmers' institute work carried on by the State agricultural experiment station. He will deliver lectures on "Forest planting in Kansas" at twelve different points, as follows: March 9, Gove; March 10, Hoxie; March 11, Waldo; March 12, Barnard; March 13, Pleasant Hill; March 14, Excelsior; March 16, Cawker City; March 17, Wayne; March 18, Miltonvale; March 19, Longford; March 20, Talmage, and March 21, Solomon.

NEW NATIONAL FOREST PROCLAIMED IN ARKANSAS.

WASHINGTON, March 7, 1908.

The President has just signed a proclamation creating the Ozark National Forest in the northwestern part of the State of Arkansas. The Ozark and the Arkansas National Forest, which was created in December last, form the two easternmost national forests. The new forest has an area of nearly 920,000 acres, and is located in Johnson, Newton, Searcy, Hope, and Van Buren counties, on the divide between the Arkansas and White rivers. It includes the Boston Mountains and other ridges along the southern extremity of the Ozark Range of Missouri.

The area included in the new Ozark Forest is natural forest land, for the most part covered with unbroken stands of hard wood and short-leaf pine. Oak, hickory, elm, gum, maple, and ash are the predominating trees, while the pine is found in limited areas in the southeastern part of the forest.

The timber is estimated to be worth not less than $1,500,000 just as it stands, and may bring $5,000,000 if properly handled, as the people of the country who are now selling the timber do not realize the value of their possessions and are accepting $1.50 to $3 per thousand board feet, and in some cases $3 to $5 per acre. The stands on the forest run all the way from nothing up to 12,000 feet per acre, averaging about 3,000 feet in merchantable timber. The value of the timber is conservatively placed at $3 to $5 per thousand feet. It is estimated that there is not less than one-half billion feet of hard-wood saw timber alone, besides a vast amount of timber suitable for railroad ties, handles, spokes, and wagon stock, and timber which is not now cut except for fuel, but which will later become merchantable as the shortage of hard wood increases.

The destruction of the timber through fire has reduced the value of much of the land, and in many places the slopes are washed so badly that the soil has lost much of its power to produce timber. It is thought, however, that under careful management most of these areas can, in time, be reforested

Samuel J. Record, supervisor of the Arkansas National Forest, will also be in charge of the Ozark, and will continue to have his headquarters at Fort Smith. It is thought that he will have four to six guards added to his force to begin the administration of the new forest in addition to those who have been appointed on the Arkansas National Forest. These men will be natives of the State.

The Ozark and Arkansas forests will give the State a total national forest area of nearly 2,000,000 acres, but all of the land is not under Government control, as considerable areas have been taken up under various claims. The creation of the Ozark National Forest has put another relatively small tract of the immense forest area of the Mississippi Valley under a system of management according to the principles of scientific forestry. The work on the forest will serve as an object lesson of conservative lumbering and will surely be watched with interest by private owners of large tracts of forest land in other parts of the Mississippi Valley.

The headquarters of Buffalo Fork, White River, and Little Red River are included in the Ozark forest, as well as numerous smaller streams. On account of the more frequent occurrence of fire and the larger area of denuded land on the south side, the streams are nearly all muddy, testifying to the rapid erosion which is in marked contrast to the clear sparkling water of Buffalo Fork. At the present time, the streams are not used for developing water power, but in all probability they will be of great importance for this use in the near future.

All claims valid prior to the withdrawal of the lands in question will not be affected by the creation of this forest, and all lands chiefly valuable for agriculture and not needed for administrative purposes, that were unavoidably included within the boundaries of this forest, upon application will be listed by the Secretary of Agriculture with the Secretary of the Interior for settlement under the homestead laws.

The new forest brings the total area of the national forests in the United States up to 164,963,555 acres. Practically all of this land is located in the Rocky Mountains and Pacific coast region, and all of it is west of the Mississippi.

PROGRESS MADE IN STUDY OF KENTUCKY FORESTS.

Kentucky is making good progress in the movement for the preservation of the forests of the State. In 1906 the legislature enacted the law providing for the State board of agriculture, forestry, and immigration. During the following winter the board asked and received the cooperation of the United States Forest Service in a study of the forest conditions of the State. The work was begun last summer and the investigations of a considerable area of land in the eastern part of the State completed. At the third annual meeting of the Kentucky Farmers' Institute, at Frankfort, in February, the subject of forestry was discussed with an interest which promises for Kentucky a high place among the other progressive States which are looking to the careful use and conservation of forest resources.

The manner in which the forestry problem has been approached indicates that the people of Kentucky realize that the ultimate solution of the impending timber scarcity must, for the farmer, depend largely on how he handles his individual timber resources, and that there is no better way than for him to consider the wood lot as a bank account, using the interest which is constantly accruing, but leaving the capital undiminished. Much education work, however, will be needed to secure this desirable end.

A bill has been introduced in the legislature providing for the appointment of a State forester. The wisdom of this is evident since only by the appointment of a State forester can the work begun in cooperation with the Forest Service be maintained and carried to a successful conclusion. Until such time, however, as the State of Kentucky is ready to assume the management of its own forest problems the national Service is willing and anxious to cooperate in every way possible for the furtherance of forestry among private owners in Kentucky. In the cooperative investigations of forest resources now in progress the Government has agreed to apportion a sum equal to the $2,000 appropriated by the State, making a total of $4,000 available for the work. During the past summer the study has exhausted $2,300 of this amount, leaving $1,700 with which to continue investigations this season.

Kentucky has always been rich in forest resources, but, like many other States, she has reached the place where the timber is produced on a continually decreasing scale, and it is necessary to protect and use carefully the forests which remain. In 1899 Kentucky cut 734,000,000 board feet of hard-wood lumber. In 1906 the cut had fallen to 615,000,000 board feet, a decrease of over 16 per cent in the past eight years. In the same period the cut of yellow poplar has fallen off over 37 per cent. This reduction is in spite of the fact that during the same time prices of hard wood have advanced on an average of 20 per cent, and the demand has increased accordingly. These figures mean that Kentucky, which is one of the chief hard-wood producing States in the Union, and is still the first State in the production of yellow poplar, has a rapidly diminishing supply of timber.

NEW ZEALAND INTRODUCES FOREIGN TREES.

WASHINGTON, March 10, 1908.

Trees from the United States, Europe, and Australia are being systematically introduced into the native forests of New Zealand. In the climate of that country trees from almost anywhere will thrive, and this fact is taken advantage of to plant the most profitable species. Eleven million larches, oaks, spruces, Douglas firs, and eucalyptuses have been set in plantations, and vast numbers of seedlings are coming on in nurseries. These are rapidly growing species which also make excellent timber.

The reason given for introducing foreign trees is that the native trees of New Zealand are too slow in growth. Some of them, as the kauri pine, grow to gigantic size and produce excellent timber, but it takes from two hundred years up to do so. Successful forestry demands quicker returns.

More rapid changes in animal and vegetable life are taking place in New Zealand than almost anywhere else in the world. The native Polynesian race is rapidly disappearing before the European. The wild animals—native to the islands—amount to little in the contest with animals brought in, many of which now run wild. The streams are full of American and European trout, which grow to enormous size. The very forests are to be replaced, tree by tree, by planting foreign species as the native woods disappear.

New Zealand has 1,200,000 acres of forest, with 200 kinds of trees. It is estimated that the native forests will last, at the present rate of cutting, for seventy years. The replacement will therefore be gradual. But in the end, if the imported trees prove to be more valuable economically than the native ones, they will make up the future forests of the country.

Forestry was taken up in New Zealand over thirty years ago, but was abandoned after a few years. The reason given for dropping it was that it cost more than it was worth. After several years of exploitation, it was generally conceded that the abandonment of forestry by the Government was a serious mistake, and it was taken up again with renewed energy. Nurseries and plantations are being extended as rapidly as circumstances will allow. The yearly timber cut of New Zealand is about half a billion feet, nearly the same amount as the annual cut of British Columbia.

[From the New York Tribune.]

AMERICA PRODUCES MUCH EXCELSIOR.

Excelsior seems to the average man a trifling product, and one that by reason of its lightness can not represent a large consumption of timber; yet there are so many uses for it that the total annual production for the country requires 60,000,000 feet of timber, or the growth of 10,000 acres of forest land.

Besides the constant use in general packing, excelsior is in demand by upholsterers of furniture and carriages, by mattress makers, occasionally for stable bedding, and by steamships to filter sea water. A richly upholstered chair and a mattress which a customer fondly supposes to be filled with hair contain nothing but excelsior beneath—possibly a layer of cotton. Thus, we sit and sleep on wood as well as read wood-pulp newspapers, and at the mortal end of things we are likely to repose in a coffin upholstered with a choice grade of excelsior. One New York mattress factory uses a carload a day. Teddy bears owe their rotundity to a special quality of fine excelsior.

Logs must be perfectly dry for the manufacture of excelsior. They are generally seasoned for six months in sheds and then cut into 16-inch lengths and quartered. These blocks are fastened in the machine and are automatically fed thereafter. A series of sharp spurs, 8 inches wide and placed a fraction of an inch apart, rapidly scores the surface of the block to a depth that is less than the thickness of a match. A knife follows, planing the block to the depth of the scoring, and a bunch of curly excelsior falls on a traveling belt.

One excelsior machine turns out half a ton a day, and the total annual production is estimated at 25,000 carloads, averaging 15 tons each. There is not much wood left on 10,000 acres of land when the excelsior machines have had their year's rations.

CONSERVATION OF FOREST RESOURCES ADVOCATED BY LUMBER WHOLESALERS.

That the lumbermen of the country who are engaged in the manufacture and distribution of forest products are interested in the work of the Government in conserving the natural resources of the United States was evidenced at the recent annual meeting of the National Wholesale Lumber Dealers' Association in Washington, D. C., when more time was given up to the question of forestry than to any other topic that came up before the convention. This association takes in approximately 400 of the wholesale lumbermen from all parts of the country, and what they had to say about the practical value of forestry is naturally of much public interest.

The secretary of the association in his annual report recommended that the wholesalers as a body should encourage in every way the study of forestry as a part of the regular curriculum of the public schools. A report also was received from the delegate appointed to attend the Congressional hearing to urge the taking of a census of the standing timber. The report, which pointed out the absolute necessity of determining accurately the amount of timber in the country and which carried with it an indorsement of the project, was adopted without a dissenting voice. The deep interest of the lumbermen in the matter of forestry was again manifested when the programme of the meeting was extended to permit of the calling upon representatives of the Forest Service to address the meeting.

The attitude of the lumbermen toward forestry was aptly described during the meeting by a wholesaler, who said: "Lumbermen are not interested in forestry or the work of the Forest Service on any theoretical grounds, but we look upon forestry as a business proposition solely and what it will return to us in dollars and cents. We all realize that the available supply of timber is becoming smaller and smaller each year, and that if we are to continue in business we must conserve the supply. When I first began business many years ago we got our white pine and hemlock from Pennsylvania exclusively to distribute in the eastern markets. To-day practically all our white pine comes from Michigan and Minnesota and our hemlock from West Virginia and adjoining States. In a comparatively few years, at the present rate of cutting, we will have to go still farther for our supplies, and even substitutes, and at the same time lumber will cost us considerably more, and the consumer will have to pay the price."

INCREASING GRAZING ALLOTMENT ON OREGON NATIONAL FOREST.

The Forest Service has recommended that the number of cattle and horses allowed to graze upon the Blue Mountains (W) National Forest in the State of Oregon during the season of 1908 be increased from 16,000 to 17,900 head and the number of sheep from 150,000 to 152,500 head. This forest has recently been divided into three administrative units, and the increase in the number of head of stock to graze on the range this year was made to permit an equitable adjustment among the former users of the forest.

THIRTY-SIX THOUSAND SHEEP TO GRAZE ON PRESCOTT NATIONAL FOREST.

The Forest Service has recommended that the number of sheep allowed to graze on the Prescott national forest, in the Territory of Arizona, during the season of 1908, be increased from 30,000 to 36,000 head.

This is the first year of administration on a large area which was added to the forest, and the grazing allotment has been increased to provide for all of the stock which is entitled to be grazed upon this range through regular use in the past.

FOREST RANGER'S EXAMINATION IN SEVENTEEN STATES.

The United States Civil Service Commission has just announced that examinations will be held for the position of ranger at the supervisor's headquarters at every national forest on April 23 and 24. It is estimated that 300 more rangers will be required during the present fiscal year than were on duty last year, and eligibles to fill these vacancies will be furnished the Forest Service by the coming examinations. The examinations will be held in seventeen States and Territories at the following places:

Alaska.—Ketchikan.

Arkansas.—Fort Smith.

Arizona.—Benson, Douglas, Flagstaff, Nogales, Roosevelt, Safford, Show Low, Springerville.

California.—Alturas, Bishop, Elk Creek, Hemet, Hot Springs (Tulare County), Los Angeles, Nevada City, North Fork, Quincy, Salinas, San Luis Obispo, Santa Barbara, Sisson, Sonora, Weaverville, Yreka.

Colorado.—Cillbran, Delta, Denver, Sonora, Durango, Estes Park, Glenwood Springs, Gunnison, La Veta, Leadville, Meeker, Monte Vista, Saguache, Steamboat Springs, Westcliffe.

Idaho.—Boise, Hailey, Idaho Falls, Kooskia, Mackay, Meadows, Oakley, Pocatello, St. Anthony, Salmon City, Wallace, Weiser.

Minnesota.—Cass Lake.

Montana.—Anaconda, Ashland, Bozeman, Dillon, Great Falls, Helena, Highwood, Kalispell, Libby, Livingston, Missoula, Sheridan, Thompsons Falls, Townsend.

Nebraska.—Halsey.

Nevada.—Austin, Elko, Las Vegas.

New Mexico.—Alamogordo, Albuquerque, Capitan, Magdalena, Santa Fe, Silver City.

Oklahoma.—Cache.

Oregon.—Eugene, Grants Pass, Heppner, John Day, Lakeview, Medford, Portland, Prineville, Roseburg, Sumpter, Wallowa.

South Dakota.—Camp Crook, Deadwood.

Utah.—Beaver, Ephraim, Escalante, Grantsville, Kanab, Logan, Moab, Panguitch, Payson, Provo, St. George, Salina, Salt Lake City.

Washington.—Chelan, Hoodsport, Newport, Orting, Republic, Sumas, Wenatchee.

Wyoming.—Big Horn, Cody, Jackson, Pinedale, Saratoga, Sundance.

Applicants can secure information on the examination from the United States Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C., or from the forest supervisor at any of the places mentioned in the seventeen States. Those who wish to take the examination should ask for application form 1093, a copy of the Use Book and a copy of "Information regarding employment on the national forests." The papers in the examination will all be forwarded to the Civil Service Commission and the results announced in due time.

Experience, a thorough knowledge of forest conditions, and a sound body, rather than book education, are the qualities sought in examining applicants who desire to become forest rangers. The man must have the ability, however, to make simple maps and write intelligent reports upon forest business connected with the position. A ranger must be able to take care of himself and his horses in regions remote from settlement and supplies. Necessary qualifications of applicants include the knowledge of trail building, construction of cabins, and the ability to ride, pack, and deal tactfully with all classes of people. They must also know something of the land laws, surveying, estimating, and scaling timber, logging, mining, and the live-stock business.

The applicant should be thoroughly familiar with the region of the country in which he seeks employment. In Arizona and New Mexico the ranger must know enough Spanish to conduct forest business with the Mexican users of the nation's forests. Personal equipment and horses for use in connection with duty of a ranger are furnished by the rangers themselves, and not by the Forest Service.

Working under the direction of the forest supervisors, the ranger patrols the forests to prevent fire and trespass, estimates, surveys, and marks timber, supervises and performs other duties which a man thoroughly familiar with forested regions and possessing a fair education is able to fulfill.

Only those men who are at least 21 years of age and not more than 40, of good character, temperate, and in good physical condition are eligible to take the examination. The salary paid to beginners is $75 per month. Compensation runs as high as $1,400 per year for rangers who have had some experience and demonstrate their capability. Still better places are open to these men, for it is the policy of the Forest Service to fill vacancies in higher positions by the promotion of rangers who have proved their capacity.

GOVERNMENT HARVESTS BASKET WILLOWS.

WASHINGTON, March —, 1908.

The work of cutting the basket willows to supply slips for free distribution has just been begun at the Government's experimental holt at Arlington, just across the Potomac from this city. These experiments in intensive willow culture are carried on by the United States Forest Service, which distributes each year a great many cuttings, together with special instructions for growing them, to applicants in all parts of the country.

This country's willow-ware industry now has to depend on foreign growers for the great part of its supply, but each year marks an increase in the number of American holts. Experiments have shown that the product of the United States is equal to that of Europe, when the proper methods of cultivation are followed, and the owners of holts have found that willow cultivation is sometimes more profitable than the growing of other crops.

The four varieties of approved basket willows propagated at Arlington have made an excellent growth compared with those of other holts throughout Maryland and Pennsylvania. The unfavorable weather in the spring of 1907 greatly retarded the growth of the young rods in most localities, but the holt at Arlington is so favorably situated that little or no harm was done the willows there. On the contrary, the "American Green" has made a better growth in the Government holt this year than in any previous year. The rods are long, straight, and branchless. In the case of the Welsh the rods are not so long as those of last year, but the average number of rods per stool is higher and the total weight far exceeds that of all previous crops.

Both the Lemley and the Patent Lemley have again yielded very satisfactory results, but they, more than any other variety, show that close spacing is necessary in order to shade the soil sufficiently to prevent it from drying out. In plats where the spacing is 6 by 18 inches or 9 by 20 inches apart the rods are long and slender and almost entirely without branches. In plats where the stools are set 12 by 36 inches apart, the rods remained very short and produced numerous side branches, which shows that close spacing is the proper method of management in holts where the object is the production of high-grade rods.

After the rods of each plat are cut and carefully sorted into different height classes, they are tied into bundles weighing from 40 to 50 pounds and placed on their butt ends in a pit containing water from 4 to 6 inches deep. They remain in this position until the sap rises and the rods put forth new leaves. During the latter part of April and early May the bark will be removed by ordinary hand peeling. A large percentage of the rods of all varieties have been selected to make cuttings for free distribution.

FOREST SERVICE NOTES.

Arizona.—Paul P. Pelichlynn has been appointed forest guard on the Tonto (N) National Forest, Arizona, and A. C. Hockderffer, of Flagstaff, has been appointed a forest guard on the San Francisco Mountains National Forest, Ariz.

Arkansas.—The following have been appointed guards on the Arkansas National Forest: Edgar V. Biler, Sidney A. Chappell, of Prescott, Ark., Redmon D. Stone, of Waldron, and Samuel S. Little, of Rich Mountain.

The following have been appointed guards on the Ozark National Forest: C. Edward Boyd, of Elberta; Lewis Carlton, of Jasper, Shelbey B. Hinkle, of Mountain View; Andrew J. James, of Combs, and Ben Vaughan, of Eureka Springs.

California.—Pascal K. Hargrave has been appointed a forest guard on the San Gabriel National Forest, Cal.

Idaho.—Charles West, of Boise, Idaho, and Frank Hendrick, of Lardo, have been appointed deputy forest rangers on the Sawtooth (W) National Forest.

Frederick C. Haman, of Salmon, and Ross S. Tobias, of Challis, have been appointed assistant forest rangers on the Salmon River National Forest.

Charles E. Hess has been appointed a forest guard on the Sawtooth (W) National Forest.

Montana.—Charles A. Spencer has been appointed a forest guard on the Big Hole (N) National Forest, Mont., effective April 1.

New Mexico.—Crispin Wright has been appointed a forest guard on the Gila (S) National Forest.

Washington.—Albian J. Finch, of Hoodsport, Wash., has been appointed an assistant forest ranger on the Olympic National Forest.

Wyoming.—F. S. Ripper and William D. Clemons have been appointed forest guards on the Yellowstone (Wind River Division) National Forest, to act as hunters.

WILD HORSES.

Wild horses by the thousands are overrunning the Government national forests of Nevada and neighboring States, and the authorities in Washington are besieged with petitions from stockmen and farmers begging them to put a stop to the nuisance. A recent dispatch from Reno conveyed the intelligence that there are 15,000 of the untamed beasts upon the Toivabe, Toquina, and Monitor forest reserves in Lander County alone, and that orders have been received by the forest rangers to begin a systematic war of extermination upon them. This dispatch, although twisted as to facts, does not exaggerate the number of horses now supposed to be roaming at large in the districts mentioned. As a matter of probable truth there are a good many more than 15,000 wild horses in Nevada and the neighboring States, and every herd is a pest to the owners of vegetation and domestic stock.

The part of the Reno telegram which is not true is that relating to the orders sent from Washington. Neither the forest rangers nor any other employees of the Government have been told to destroy the horses, and unless they do receive such orders they will confine their energies to fencing crops from the trespassing animals or rounding them up when they appear and threaten damage to the range. Indeed, if half the stories brought to the capital are true, all the rangers in Uncle Sam's service would have little chance of destroying the big herds that are roaming over the Western States.

Within the last few years they have increased to such an extent that in many localities they are classed as "varmints," with wolves, wildcats, and grizzlies, and every man's rifle is turned against them. No fence is strong enough to stop these horses, and when they appear in force they have even been known to knock down and kill cows and calves. After each visitation from a herd the ranchman is likely to mourn the loss of his domestic horses, and it requires only a few days' association with their new companions for the best-broken animals to become as wild as their nomadic comrades.

A study of the wild-horse problem brings to light many interesting facts about the animals. The legislature of Nevada, it seems, passed a law many years ago specifically allowing hunters to shoot wild horses and to sell their hides for what they could get in the open market. The law opened the way to a new and unusual industry, and many men found the killing of wild horses very profitable. Besides, the work was exciting and gave the business the added zest of sport.

As time went on and the business of killing these "outlaws" (as the wild horses were often termed) on the ranges assumed greater and greater proportions, stockmen found that the professional hunters were, in many cases, abusing their rights and were killing branded and shod horses. This put an end to the business, for on complaint of the stockmen the Nevada legislature promptly repealed the law. It is estimated that 15,000 animals were killed during the time that the law was in force. This figure gave the basis for last week's story.

The report, however, had good basis of fact, for the wild-horse question has grown to be as serious in the last few years as it was when the Nevada legislature was forced to enact the old law. The United States Forest Service has not given orders for the killing of a single horse, because it has no right to do so. The forest officers of the Nevada national forests realize how bad conditions are, and will do anything to assist the stockmen to put down the nuisance.

Any one who finally discovers an effective method to settle this problem will have done a great service for the stockmen of every State west of the Missouri River. As an old and experienced stockman, now in the employ of Uncle Sam, said of the wild-horse problem, "Theoretically it seems a very simple matter to handle, but practically it is quite the reverse." On the ranges of many of the national forests the supervisors have been at their wits' ends for several years trying to devise a method to meet the difficulty. Apparently an entirely satisfactory method can not be found, because of the inadequate estray laws now enforced in the different States. Under the circumstances, the following plan has been recommended to meet the conditions in the national forests:

"If the presence of the horses is seriously damaging the national forest range and public sentiment favors such action, the supervisor may, upon petition of a majority of the permittees of a grazing district, allow the horses to be gathered and disposed of according to the State or Territorial laws. In such cases the Forest Service will, upon recommendation from the supervisor, cooperate in the construction of corrals or fences for the purpose of capturing the horses.

"Forest officers may drive unpermitted horses from the national forests at any time, but if the owners of the horses are known and ownership acknowledged, the owner should be allowed to adjust the matter by paying the grazing fee. If he refuses to apply for a permit, then a trespass charge should be brought against him and the case conducted according to instructions.

"Unbranded horses may be handled according to the State estray laws, but forest officers can not be allowed to gather such horses for the purpose of using or selling them, nor can they be allowed to collect any remuneration from any person for corralling unclaimed horses. The policy of the Forest Service will be, therefore, to cooperate with the stockmen of the State or Territorial authorities when they take the initiative in disposing of wild horses in the national forests, but the present laws and regulations do not admit of independent action by the Forest Service."

The wild-horse problem is only one of the many which stockmen have to contend with which the Government is trying in one way or another to solve on the ranges of the national forests. Predatory animals, such as wolves, coyotes, mountain lions, and wild-cats, do thousands of dollars' worth of damage to stock each year in all parts of the country. On some ranges forest officers have to contend with rustlers, who sometimes succeed in stealing the greater part of the stock which the predatory animals do not kill. Poisonous plants are another nuisance which give the stockmen considerable trouble in many parts of the country.

Uncle Sam has always shown a disposition to cooperate with the stockmen in combating these nuisances; in fact, he is doing better than merely meeting the stockmen halfway in the work. On many of the national forest ranges for the last year rangers and guards have been assigned to the work of hunting and trapping, with the sole aim of killing off the animals that prey upon stock. The work has met with marked success, and hundreds of wolves and coyotes have succumbed to the bullets and the poison of the hunters. Each animal killed means a decided saving to the sheep industry, for it is estimated that one wolf averages about $1,000 damage each year.

Forest officers are cooperating with the stock associations to stop the stealing of live stock and run the rustlers out of the country. The war on poisonous plants has been carried on for more than a year by the Forest Service, in cooperation with the Bureau of Plant Industry, and, while the investigations have just been begun, it is already seen that their growth can be checked in many States.

If it is possible to check the wild-horse nuisance as easily as the other troubles which have bothered the stock interests, both the stockmen and forest officers will find the Western ranges rid of another serious drawback which helps to retard progress in the business.

PINE TREES RECLAIM ABANDONED FARMS.

Everywhere in the Eastern and Southern States the ax is transforming the magnificent forests of the past into culled and cut-over land. The demand for lumber is so great and operations are so extensive that in a comparatively few years those who wish to see timber in its virgin luxuriance will have to visit distant and isolated sections of the country.

Under the new conditions brought about by the exploitation of the virgin forests a type of woodlands known as "the old-field pine" has developed into commercial importance within recent years as a result of clearing away the original forests for agricultural purposes. This old-field type promises to increase in value more and more with the corresponding increase in the price of wood products. Old fields are common both in the South and in the North, although they arise from different causes and become reforested with different species of trees.

In the South, before the civil war, vast areas of land were in cultivation which have since been allowed to return to forest. Many thousands of acres were often included within a single plantation, mostly cleared, and growing splendid crops of cotton, corn, tobacco, and many other valuable farm products. It is common to-day to see in certain sections of the South old plantations of great extent that are now growing up with loblolly, or, as it is generally called, "old-field pine."

The war was responsible for this neglect of cultivated land. With the freeing of the slaves the immense plantations could no longer be managed, and the land was abandoned. In many cases, however, the land was impoverished through many years of cultivation, but with the use of fertilizers will be reclaimed in the future. Farmers now point out splendid stands of pine already large enough to be lumbered on land that they once plowed. Growth has been phenomenal, the trees being often 12 to 14 inches in diameter at an age of no more than 20 to 25 years.

Loblolly pine bears seed prolifically nearly every year, and, being light, these seeds are carried long distances by the wind. The open fields offer ideal places for the young trees to start. The ground has been worked many years and there is no young oak brush to interfere with their growth, as in the case of the stump or cut-over lands. Long-leaf pine, on the other hand, seeds much less abundantly, and the seeds being heavier are not carried by the wind far from the mother trees, so that its reproduction is much less abundant. The loblolly, however, is most aggressive in taking possession of abandoned lands, and preeminently deserves its popular name of "old-field pine."

Through this natural reforestation nature has freely furnished a source of income on land that would otherwise have been unproductive all these years. Yet it has not been until recently that the old field pine was thought to have any value. There were forests of long-leaf pine everywhere close at hand and the wood was much superior for every purpose. Fence rails made from long-leaf pine last many years, but loblolly rails soon decay and must be frequently replaced. Railroads through the pine country would accept nothing but long-leaf pine for ties. So the old fields were allowed to grow up and remain untouched except that occasionally the owner would cut down a few trees to prevent them from encroaching into his very dooryard.

Ideas are changing rapidly now as to the value and uses of certain woods. The long-leaf pine is disappearing from the land and there are few young trees to take the place of the old. Necessity for future wood material has resulted in many investigations and experiments with inferior kinds of wood. Loblolly, or old field pine, has been found to be exceedingly durable when impregnated with creosote. This has given the old-field pine a new value and to-day thousands of railroad ties are cut near the railroads and shipped to treating plants to be creosoted. Small portable mills are easily and cheaply located, and many of these are now cutting the best trees in these old-field stands for lumber, to be used locally among the farmers. The future lumbering will be carried on exclusively in these second-growth stands of old-field pine.

The situation in the North is very much the same. White pine is here found occupying the old fields much as loblolly pine does in the South. The seeds are light and are carried considerable distances to the open fields, where they find plenty of light and suitable soil conditions to make excellent growth.

Fifty years ago or more there were many small areas under cultivation, which have since been abandoned and have now grown up to white pine. Farming has always been on a small scale, but with the development of great farming interests in the West the farmer of the Northeast has been handicapped in his competition for the markets. Many of the younger generation have left the old home farms and gone to the cities for more lucrative employment. All this has resulted in abandonment of old farms and fields, and many of these are growing up to pine. There is a tendency for men who left the farms many years ago to return and spend the summer months among their boyhood surroundings. They love the native forests and consequently encourage the growth of pine in the fields once cultivated. So there is an esthetic as well as a commercial value attached to this young growth.

The white pine of the Northeast does not compare in rate of growth with the old-field pine of the South, but the wood is more valuable for lumber, box boards, shingles, and other purposes, and the demand for second growth pine is very great. It is estimated there are 800,000 acres of abandoned land in southern New Hampshire, and a large part of this is growing up to white pine. Investigations show that it is most profitable to lumber these second growth stands of white pine when they are 50 to 60 years old.

There is a large and increasing source of wealth in our old-field pine lands. It is never the object of forestry to encourage tree growth on land that is better suited for agriculture. At the same time there are vast areas uncultivated that are producing no income to their owners. Such land should be permitted to grow trees and be protected from fire and misuse until such time as they may become more desirable for other purposes.

TO STUDY PROBLEM OF FOREST TAXATION.

WASHINGTON, March —, 1908.

The first exhaustive study of the forest taxation problem, as it is presented by the actual workings of existing laws, to be attempted by any State has just been begun by the New Hampshire State forestry commission, in cooperation with the United States Forest Service. The study will take in all of the many questions of forest land taxation and the protection of New Hampshire forests from fires. If necessary to complete the work, $3,000 will be available. J. H. Foster, of the Forest Service, has been sent up from Washington to take up the investigations on the ground immediately.

Because of its thoroughness, New Hampshire's study is sure to be followed with great interest by New York, Maine, Michigan, Pennsylvania, and the other States which are finding the forest tax problem a serious check to forest preservation. Mr. Foster will find out by painstaking inquiry in different parts of the State and among all classes of citizens just how the present laws are administered, how they are regarded, and what their effect is on the lumber industry and forest preservation. The result will be to furnish New Hampshire with a better basis for revising its system of taxing forest lands than any State has ever had before, if changes in the present laws are found to be needed.

Taxation of timber land is regarded by officers of the Forest Service as one of the most important matters now up for discussion. They believe that upon the right settlement of this question largely depends the rapidity with which private owners adopt forestry. Agitation for a change is taking place along two directly opposite lines—for an increase in the amount of taxes to be paid by wild lands, on the one hand, and on the other for the passing of laws which will partially or wholly exempt from taxation reforested lands or will defer the collection of taxes on the forest crop until it is harvested. Those who urge increasing the tax believe that this class of property does not now pay its just share of the general tax burden. Those who advocate laws to lighten the weight of taxation on forest lands in one way or another maintain that the public welfare is promoted by the preservation of forests, and that the more heavily they are taxed the more certain it is that they will either be wiped out altogether or lose most of their value through destructive lumbering.

In Maine and New York proposed changes in existing laws are now up for discussion. In Maine a tax commission appointed by the last legislature is about to hold public hearings, and the report goes that it will be asked to recommend a scheme whereby wild lands may be taxed on the same basis as municipal property, or about 2 per cent annually. In the New York legislature a bill has been introduced which would tax timber lands managed with the approval of the forest, fish, and game commission at a rate not higher than that for barren unproductive land in the same tax district, with an additional tax of 3 per cent on the stumpage value of the timber when it is cut. Both measures would create a special class of property—in Maine to make it pay heavier taxes; in New York, lighter. In Maine the value of standing timber is regarded as a part of the value of the land, and the owner is expected to pay a rising tax as his timber grows more valuable, until he cuts it off. In the New York bill the timber is regarded as a growing crop, which, like other growing crops, should be exempted from taxation until it is harvested. The New York bill seeks to encourage forestry as a means of increasing the wealth of the State. The Maine plan, if carried through, will powerfully discourage forestry.

The New Hampshire study has been undertaken in the belief that it will help solve what is undeniably a knotty problem. A forest taxation law which is both wise and practicable is by no means easy to draw. In Pennsylvania, a State which appreciates the value of its forests and the importance of foresighted action to prevent non-agricultural lands from becoming worthless wastes, a law passed in 1905 providing for a rebate of taxes levied upon forested lands was pronounced unconstitutional by the courts, because it destroyed uniformity of taxation. On the other hand, the State of Michigan has one-sixth of its area on the delinquent-tax list because the land is worthless for any purpose but growing forests and is taxed too high to be held by the owners for this purpose. It is not easy to draft a law which is workable, fair to all property owners, and in the best interest of the State, as this is involved in keeping its forest lands productive.

One of the guiding principles to be recognized, however, the Government's foresters point out, is that it does not pay any community to tax one of its productive industries out of existence. It is much better to have timber lands pay a low tax steadily than to have them so lumbered as to lose practically all of their value. The heavy tax advocated in Maine, for example, will probably, if carried through, drive a great deal of capital out of the State. This capital is now invested in standing timber. At present the owners have shown that they wish to cut conservatively, protect their holdings against fire, and plan for growing as heavy future crops as possible on the same land. But a tax of 2 per cent a year on young timber, they say, sets a premium on its destruction. A powerful incentive is given the owner to reduce the value of his property by cutting off everything in sight. If this is true, it will not help the citizens of Maine in the long run to tax heavily for a short time property which can and will quickly get away, leaving only a waste behind.

It is the old fable of the goose and the golden egg over again. The forests are a valuable asset to the State of Maine, not only for the timber they grow, but also for the support they give to other industries and the money they bring in through the expenditures of sportsmen and tourists. Putting a disguised bounty on cutting them off will, in the opinion of forestry experts, lower the tax-paying power of the State and throw a heavier burden on the very persons who are hoping to decrease their present taxes by making the wild lands pay more. The farmer who is discontented because woodlands are assessed so low should remember that he does not himself pay taxes on standing crops, that half a loaf is better than no bread, and that it is better for a man to look before he leaps than to find too late that he has landed in a hole.

FRANCE PLANTS FORESTS.

France has given the world many valuable lessons in forestry. One of the most interesting articles in recent consular reports is the description of the reclamation of sand dunes and marshes by the Department of the Landes in the south of France and the high returns from the cultivation of pine there.

Comprising about two and a half million acres of what were barren sand dunes prior to 1803, this area has been reclaimed by forest planting until it has become one of the most productive and healthful regions of the Republic. The underground drainage of the country has been changed by the roots of the trees penetrating the layer of clay which underlies the sand.

In addition to supplying timber this area supports a number of industries dependent on the cultivation of the pine, including the production of turpentine, rosin, tar, pitch, charcoal, and other products of similar nature.

In the system by which the forest is managed, so that early returns are obtained, the trees are divided into two classes: The "short-life" trees and the "standing" trees. The former are tapped as soon as they are big enough to stand "bleeding," about 4 or 5 inches in diameter, and when they are bled to death they are removed as "thinnings," the wood being used for pit props, the English demand guaranteeing a steady and profitable market. The second class, composed of the most vigorous individuals, are not tapped until they are about 10 to 15 inches in diameter. The age of these trees when they are felled is from 50 to 60 years. The timber is used for lumber, poles, and railway ties.

Of these forests, about 80 per cent belongs to individuals, while from the 125,000 acres belonging to the Government there was obtained as revenue in 1905, $98,811, as against $640 in 1885, the first year in which any revenue was obtained.

FOREST SERVICE NOTES.

Arkansas.—Seward C. Logan has been appointed a forest guard on the Arkansas National Forest.

Arizona.—Franklin R. Taylor, of Pima, Ariz., has been appointed an assistant forest ranger on the Tonto (S) National Forest.

Idaho.—Sterling R. Justice, of Idaho, has been appointed a forest guard on the Port Neuf National Forest.

Nevada.—James McNamara has been appointed a forest guard on the Independence National Forest.

Wyoming.—Willis E. Broadhurst, of Laramie, has been appointed an assistant forest ranger on the Sundance National Forest.

Montana.—John A. Daeley and Fred Holbrook have been appointed forest guards on the Lewis and Clark (S) National Forest.

Harry Ralvley has been appointed a forest guard on the Bitter Root National Forest.

John D. Kinsey has been appointed a forest guard on the Long Pine, Ekalaka National Forest, Mont., and on the Short Pine and Slim Buttes National Forests, S. Dak. Mr. Kinsey's work will be in hunting and trapping predatory animals on the forest ranges.

South Dakota.—John D. Kinsey has been appointed a forest guard on the Short Pine and Slim Buttes National Forests. Mr. Kinsey will be assigned to the work of hunting and trapping predatory animals on the forest ranges.

Colorado.—V. B. Bryan, of Fraser, Colo., has been appointed a forest guard on the White River National Forest.

David C. Montgomery, jr., has been appointed an assistant forest ranger on the Pikes Peak National Forest.

James L. Tagert, of Meeker, has been appointed an assistant forest ranger on the White River National Forest.

Tobias Torres has been appointed a forest guard on the San Juan National Forest, Colo.

Martin K. Slane has been appointed a forest guard on the Cochetopa National Forest. Mr. Torres and Mr. Slane will be assigned to the work of hunting and trapping predatory animals on the forest ranges.

IMPORTANCE OF CELLULOSE.

"Cellulose is the foundation of our modern civilization" is the rather startling statement made by one of Uncle Sam's experts in the section of wood chemistry in the United States Forest Service. Not until one begins to figure just how intimately his daily life is bound up with cellulose can he appreciate the truth of this statement.

Just what is cellulose? Cellulose, as the name implies, is a constituent of the cell, that vital unit of all vegetable life. Cellulose is the framework of the vegetable cell and is therefore necessary to all plant and life growth. It is, however, not only in this indirect manner that cellulose is so important, but also directly in the practical application which is found for so many plant products which are mostly or partly composed of cellulose. What is wood? Mostly cellulose. What is paper? Merely a purer form of cellulose. If cotton is king, cellulose is the power behind the throne, because cotton is almost pure cellulose. Your fine linen is cellulose; thread, twine, and rope are all cellulose.

The most powerful form of cellulose is gun cotton, or nitrocellulose. Celluloid is a combination of nitrocellulose with camphor. An artificial silk is made from cellulose which is said to be superior to the real article in many respects. Coal used to be cellulose, way back in the middle ages of this globe's history, so the geologists tell us. By charring cellulose becomes charcoal. These are some of the ways in which cellulose has been, is, and may be useful to man.

One of the most serious problems confronting engineers to-day is the silting and destruction of large and costly reservoirs for the development of power, irrigation works, and other purposes. Foresters have always pointed out that forests exert a beneficial influence in lessening erosion and silting and that filling of reservoirs can be prevented only by the protection of watersheds. A letter to Forester Pinchot from J. B. Lippincott, consulting engineer of the city of Santa Barbara, Cal., throws light on this subject. Mr. Lippincott writes:

"It was determined that the city should excavate a tunnel through the Santa Ynez Mountains, back of the town. This tunnel will be 19,600 feet long, and is now nearly half finished. It is proposed, then, to build a storage reservoir on the river, impound flood waters, and discharge them through the tunnel to the coastal plain around the city. The one grave question was the silting up of any reservoir that we would build, as the river was very muddy in flood, and samples of flood water sent to the Geological Survey gave results that were rather discouraging. Consequently, the city bought two reservoir sites, so as to use the second in case the first was destroyed ultimately by silting. The city also appealed to the Forest Service for assistance. The Santa Ynez Reserve was created, private lands largely eliminated from our drainage basin, and a vigorous policy was inaugurated by the Forest Service to prevent fires and overgrazing.

"For the past three years we have had no fires in the basin above our proposed diversion point and overgrazing has been prevented, sheep and goats being entirely excluded. During the past three years we have also had good rains, giving vegetation a good chance to grow.

"I have just returned from an inspection trip to the river. It was in moderate flood, discharging about 500 second-feet from its basin of 220 square miles above our diversion point. The river was as clear as one of the high Sierra streams. There was practically no silt in it. Over 3 inches of rain had fallen during the week. The higher peaks were covered with snow, which may in part have aided the stream. None of us had ever before seen the Santa Ynez clear in flood."

Arbor Day will be celebrated in the District of Columbia to-day. In practically all of the schools there will be special exercises into which will be introduced lessons on tree planting. Trees have been provided for planting in the grounds of 100 schools, and one of the most important parts of the day's exercises will be given over to the planting of the tiny seedling.

Nearly 100 boys were taken yesterday morning to the country place of Dr. David Fairchild, of the Department of Agriculture, where they were each provided with a small Japanese flowering cherry tree. Each boy represented a school, and the tree given him will be planted to-day somewhere in the school grounds. The trees were imported from Japan by Doctor Fairchild especially for the school children of the District.

The boys were very much interested yesterday morning in the lessons in planting which were given them by Mori, the Japanese gardener at the Fairchild place. The children of the Franklin School, under the direction of Miss Sipe, who conducted the boys to Doctor Fairchild's place yesterday morning, will plant their tree to-day in Franklin Park, permission to do this having been granted them by Col. Charles S. Bromwell, superintendent of public parks and grounds.

The Japanese flowering cherry is a beautiful ornamental tree of Japan, which is so loved by the people of that oriental country that they take a holiday when it first comes into bloom each year. It is the flower which is so much used to decorate the many beautiful art objects and paintings by the Japanese.

Doctor Fairchild has nearly 250 of these trees planted at his place. They are now three years old and are expected to bloom this year. The land company which has developed Chevy Chase has also been interested in the beautiful flowering cherry, and has planted 300 of the trees on one of the avenues just off from Chevy Chase Circle.

The boys went to Doctor Fairchild's place and returned in his special car which was furnished them. Supervising Principals Elliott Kramer and Charles S. Clark accompanied the party.

Doctor Fairchild will talk on the significance of Arbor Day to-day at 1.45 before the girls of the Normal School. At this meeting Mrs. J. R. Hill, chairman of the committee on school gardens, will preside.

ADVANCE IN WOOD PRESERVATION.

"Timber thoroughly treated with proper preservatives will last almost indefinitely," says a Government expert who is an authority on wood preservation. "Engineers have known for years that this is true," he continues, "but up to the present time, at least in America, complicated and expensive plants have been necessary for the work, and wood preservation has often been too expensive an operation to allow treated timber to come into general use."

Methods in wood preservation have undergone a marked change in the last few years, however, and the work which a few years ago was limited to a few experiments carried on in scattered parts of the United States has grown with such rapidity that wood preservation has become a business which figures most prominently in the industrial life of this country.

Each year railroads are treating an increasing portion of their crossties, miners their mine props, farmers their fence posts, and the men of many other industries are bringing preservatives into play to close the pores and prepare the timber they use to resist the fungi which cause decay.

The work points the way to one of the chief means of the conservation of the nation's forest resources, for as the length of the life of timber is increased the drain upon the forests is lessened and more wood made available for use.

In nearly all localities in the Rocky Mountain and Pacific States is found an abundant supply of certain kinds of timber which have only a slight commercial importance. Engelmann spruce, lodge-pole and other kinds of pine, aspen, and cottonwood are only a partial list of the kinds of wood which are strong enough and abundant enough to win high value for construction purposes, were it not for one single defect which has prevented their general adoption—when exposed to the soil and weather they decay so rapidly that they have to be renewed too often to justify their use.

Dead timber of lodge-pole pine and other species also is found in large tracts, but is sharply discriminated against by all constructing engineers and contractors. As a matter of fact, the dead timber, provided it is sound, is just as good as green timber of the same species; and, indeed, in some ways is even more valuable. For it is well known that thoroughly seasoned timber is both stronger and more durable than the same timber when green. Timber which was killed by fire or insects, and which is still in a sound condition, differs from green timber chiefly in being thoroughly seasoned—that is to say, it is stronger, more durable, and lighter. And so not only are the freight rates considerably reduced, but a better grade of timber is secured.

Even in a thoroughly seasoned condition, lodge-pole pine, Engelmann spruce, and the other species mentioned above, are by no means durable woods when compared with Douglas fir, Oregon cedar, and the other kinds of wood which are used so extensively in construction work. And before they can successfully compete with such timbers, in spite of their lower price, they must be made to last longer under unfavorable conditions.

After several years' study, the United States Forest Service has proved that in many cases the complicated and expensive plants are not necessary for the proper treatment of many kinds of timber; and that many of the timbers which decay most rapidly in the natural state are among the easiest and cheapest to treat. Many of the species mentioned above offer little resistance to the entrance of the preservative. The principle of the method is to immerse the thoroughly seasoned wood in a hot bath of the liquid, leave it in for a few hours, and then either plunge it into a cold bath of a preservative, or else run out the hot liquid from the treating tank and fill it up again with liquid of a lower temperature. This requires only the simplest kind of machinery, and the cost of operation is so slight that even cheap timbers like fence posts and shingles can be treated by the average farmer of small means.

Although the Forest Service, by extensive experiments in all portions of the country, considers that the practicability of the process has been conclusively proved, more or less difficulty has been encountered in inducing others to adopt the process on a commercial scale. In order to demonstrate beyond any doubt that the process is adapted to commercial treatments, the Service has arranged to erect small treating plants—semicommercial in size—on several of the national forests. Tests will be made on the local timbers and careful record kept of the cost of the work. The treated timber will then be placed in permanent position, where its future durability can be compared with untreated timber of the same or other kinds.

Three such plants will be erected this spring, and it is expected that they will be in successful operation by early summer. According to the present plans one plant will be erected at some locality on or near the Black Hills National Forest, S. Dak., another on the Holy Cross National Forests in Colorado, and the third on the Henrys Lake National Forest, near St. Anthony, Idaho.

The investigations in wood preservation by the use of creosote, which is nothing more than the dead oil of coal tar and zinc chloride, is considered of such importance by the Government that one branch of a bureau in the Department of Agriculture—the office of wood preservation, in the Forest Service—is given over entirely to the work of experiments in cooperation with railroad companies, mining corporations, and individuals who desire to prolong the life of the timber which they use. Advice and practical assistance is furnished all who request it of the Forester at Washington.

WOOD PRESERVATION, AND THE PROCESS OF PRODUCING CREOSOTE OIL.

One of the significant signs of the times is the awakening of the American people to the dangerous destruction of their forest wealth, and the necessity of a wise use of what remains of it. Undoubtedly, in the future the nation must utilize its forest crop less wastefully, both in the woods and in the mill, and must make provision for future crops, but that is not the only way to prolong the timber supply. If the service of the wood which is used can be lengthened, it will largely decrease the amount of timber which must be cut. And this can be done by treating the wood with chemicals which will poison the low forms of plant life which attack it and cause it to decay. The growth of timber is slow, and, when the dearth of it becomes pressing, a new crop can not be grown quickly enough to prevent a time of severe shortage. Preservative treatment of timber has the advantage, as a remedy, that it can be applied immediately. Its importance is therefore attracting increasing attention.

Many chemicals have been used for the preservation of timber, among them being blue vitriol, corrosive sublimate, and chloride of zinc. The most effective preservative is the substance called "creosote oil," or "creosote." On account of the similarity of the names, many people suppose this to be the creosote obtained from wood, such as can be obtained, refined for medicinal purposes, at the drug stores. But the two are quite different and should not be confused. The creosote used in wood preservation is obtained from coal, by a most interesting process.

Nearly every city now uses gas for light and fuel, and many people know that this illuminating gas is often made from coal. But the many things besides gas which are obtained in this process are not so well known. It is one of these other products from which is obtained the creosote oil used for wood preservation.

To understand how all these things are produced, it is necessary to know something which the chemists can tell us. Coal, they say, is composed partly of the substance called "carbon," partly of compounds of this carbon with the gas hydrogen, which they have named "hydrocarbons." When the coal is heated sufficiently, away from air, the hydrocarbons are driven off in the form of gas. Illuminating gas is made by subjecting coal of the proper kind to this process, which is known as "dry distillation." The coal is put into a long, fire-clay oven or retort, shaped much like the giant model of the little cakes which the bakers call "lady fingers," the retorts being about 13 feet long, 2 feet wide, and 16 feet deep. A number of these retorts are built side by side, in three rows, one above the other, the ends of the retorts being supported in a brick wall, which also extends around the ends of the rows and over the top, and thus entirely incloses the retorts. Fire, from furnaces below, is carried by flues into this inclosure, so that the retorts are entirely enveloped in flame and can be heated to a very high temperature.

The retorts are partly filled with coal, after which they are sealed so that no air can get into them. They are then heated to a temperature of about 2,100° F. Under this intense heat almost all the hydrocarbons of the coal pass off, leaving behind only the "fixed" carbon, which comes out of the retort as coke. Many of the lighter compounds distilled off by the heat will now remain in the form of gas when they are cooled to ordinary temperatures, and it is some of these which make the gas finally used for lighting and fuel. But as it comes from the retorts the gas is like a thick, yellowish-green smoke, and could not be used at all for such purposes. This gas escapes from the retorts into a series of large and costly machines where the lighting gas is cleansed from its impurities and the different by-products are separated from each other. First are great "condensers," in which the gases are cooled. The cooling condenses the heavier compounds into thick liquids, which are then left behind.

One of the substances later removed from the gas is ammonia, and from such gas works comes the ammonia water which is used in every household. Another important product of the gas-making process is the coke which is left in the retort. Every year an increasing number of people use this coke for burning in kitchen stoves, and even in furnaces, instead of coal, for it makes a very hot fire and burns without any smoke.

The heavy, strong-smelling, black liquid which is collected in the cooling of the gas is what we know as coal tar. This is an exceedingly complex mixture of substances. From it are obtained not only creosote oil, but most of the dyes which are used nowadays, perfumes, and even flavoring extracts.

Gas, coal tar, and coke are also made in what is known as the by-product coke oven, which is adapted to different objects, but is operated on the same principle. Its coal tar is equally as good as the gas-works tar for making creosote oil. In recent years a great amount of gas has been made in the United States by another process and is known as water gas. This process also produces a tar which looks much like coal tar and is often difficult to tell from it. But this tar is really derived from petroleum and does not make a good oil for preserving wood from decay. Wood creosote, with which so many people are familiar, is likewise obtained from a wood tar which is produced by distilling wood. But, like water gas tar creosote, wood creosote is not so good for wood preservation as is the coal-tar creosote. When creosote is bought for that purpose, therefore, it should be certain that it is coal-tar creosote.

To obtain creosote oil from coal tar the tar is, in its turn, distilled. But this distillation is like that used for other liquids instead of that employed for the coal. The still is heated, and as the heat increases the "light oils" first pass over. Among those is the familiar carbolic acid. This is a powerful antiseptic, but it is not desirable in a wood preservative, for it evaporates so readily that it soon becomes lost from the wood. When a temperature of about 400° has been reached the distillate is turned into another receiver, and from this point on to 600° or 700° creosote oil is produced. One of the substances which is contained in this mixture is "naphthalene," from which common moth balls are made. Coal-tar creosote thus produced is the great wood preservative.

The residue remaining in the still after the distillation is "pitch," which is used chiefly in the preparation of roofing felt. In America roofing pitch is the chief end for which tar is distilled. In Europe this is not so true. Now, pitch for roofing must be rather soft. Therefore, tar distillation is not carried so far in this country as it is in Europe. For creosote oil it would be better if it were carried further, since the substances which distill at the higher temperatures in most cases neither evaporate in the air nor dissolve in water as readily as those which distill more easily. Consequently, they stay in the wood for a longer time and protect it correspondingly longer from decay. Much study is being devoted by the United States Forest Service to creosote oil to determine what its composition should be to give the best results in preserving timber under different conditions and how the most desirable creosotes may be obtained. The reports of these studies, together with detailed description of the more economical processes of applying the preservatives to wood, have been worked into circulars, which the Government has placed at the disposal of all users of timber, and which will be furnished to all who make the request of the Forester at Washington.

FOREST SERVICE NOTES.

Oregon.—James H. Looney has been appointed forest guard on the Freemont National Forest and Orloff A. Stafford, of Spray, Oreg., assistant forest ranger on the Heppner National Forest.

Colorado.—Robert L. Addington, of Gardner, Colo., has been appointed a forest guard on the Wet Mountains National Forest and Frank J. Broll, of Sapinero, Colo., has been appointed an assistant forest ranger on the Gunnison National Forest.

Utah.—James G. Houston, of Panguitch, Utah, has been appointed an assistant forest ranger on the Sevier National Forest, effective April 1.

New Mexico.—The following forest guards have been appointed: E. D. Rockwell on the Sacramento National Forest and R. M. Straw on the Gila (S) National Forest. Mr. Straw's work will be in hunting and trapping predatory animals on the forest ranges.

California.—Ferris Hoborn has been appointed a forest guard on the Stanislaus National Forest.

Idaho.—The following forest guards have been appointed: Dick Kenelty and Francisco Bockman have been appointed on the Kootenai National Forest and Frank H. Knowlton has been appointed an assistant ranger on the Priest River National Forest.

Nevada.—The following forest guards have been appointed: Charles D. Keough on the Toiyabe National Forest, James A. Cirvin on the Toquima National Forest, Will Tremewan on the Independence National Forest, and C. E. Jones on the Ruby Mountain National Forest.

Mr. SMOOT. The convention of the National Wool Growers' Association at Salt Lake, Utah, January 17, 18, and 19, 1907, was attended by the Forester and twenty-two other members of the Forest Service. These men, who included Mr. A. F. Potter, chief of the branch of grazing, and twenty-one supervisors and rangers from national forests in Idaho, Wyoming, Nevada, and Utah, were called to Salt Lake by the Forester, in order to hold an official meeting with him for the purpose fully described as follows by the Secretary of Agriculture in his letter of April 27, 1908, to the Senate (Document No. 449, 60th Cong., 1st sess.) in response to Senate resolution No. 157:

Members of the Forest Service attend meetings, official or unofficial, for three purposes:

(1) Improvement of the efficiency of the national forest administration through instruction of forest officers in their duties and conference with each other concerning their work.

These are official meetings of the Forest Service. They are schools of instruction or institutes, at which practical difficulties of administration are discussed, in the light of actual experience, to the end that the methods which have been found most desirable may be brought out, judgment trained, standards raised, and practice made uniform along the best lines. These meetings have immensely increased the efficiency of forest officers and the practical usefulness of the national forests.

These men by instruction from the Forester also attended the convention of the National Wool Growers' Association at Salt Lake for the purpose also fully described by the Secretary of Agriculture as follows, in his letter of April 27 to the Senate:

(2) Forest officers attend meetings of users of the national forests to learn their views, discuss their needs, and explain the objects and methods of the Government.

Such meetings include local informal gatherings, meetings of regularly organized associations, local, State, or national, and conventions representing interests affected by the national forests. To refuse such opportunities for mutual conference, for the removal of misunderstandings, and for the promotion of action along lines approved, supported, and modified by public sentiment I should consider a serious mistake in judgment. The frequent result of such conferences has been to remove misunderstanding or opposition on the part of users of the forests, either through recognition that they had just cause of complaint and removal of the cause, or through recognition on the part of the users themselves that their demands were inconsistent with the greatest good to the greatest number. So commonly at these conferences has dissatisfaction been replaced by approval of the course of the Forest Service that it has been assumed at times that the result was due to some form of coercion or manipulation.

To the best of my knowledge and belief such a charge is altogether without foundation, nor have any facts to establish such a charge, beyond the unsupported assertion of a belief that the charge was true, ever reached my attention. If any facts exist tending to show the stifling of public opinion by acts of forest officers, I earnestly hope that they will be brought forward. This matter was investigated by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, upon the basis of charges made during the second session of the Fifty-ninth Congress. The findings of the committee were presented on March 1, 1907, in House Report No. 8147, second session, Fifty-ninth Congress, pages 22–27.

The statement that there was any attempt made by the Forester, or any other member of the Forest Service concerned, to conceal expenses incurred, in whole or in part, through attendance upon the wool growers' convention, by disguising it under any other item of expenditure, is unqualifiedly false. I have copies of the official letters and telegrams to supervisors and rangers, signed by the Forester, ordering their attendance at Salt Lake. I also have copies of the accounts on file in the Treasury, upon which the official expenditures rendered necessary by the attendance of these men at Salt Lake are itemized. The utter falsity of the charge that expenses incident to the official meeting and the convention of the Wool Growers' Association at Salt Lake were concealed in items covering purchase of hay and grain is rendered still more obvious by the fact that no forest officer in attendance at Salt Lake was authorized to purchase hay or grain in bulk, but only when actually traveling on his forest, and then only for the keep of his own pack and saddle animals en route.

Meetings of the supervisors and rangers were held twice a day at Salt Lake and all phases of national forest business fully discussed, with great benefit to forest officers and consequently to those who use the national forests.

Mr. President, last week I heard it intimated that there had been corruption on the part of the Forest Service in ordering a certain ranger named Bergh to attend the wool growers' convention at Salt Lake City by ordering him to charge his expenses to hay and grain account.

I went to the Chief Forester and asked him if he knew of any such case. Mr. Pinchot was dumfounded. Mr. Adams, the assistant, knew nothing of it. I told them there was a rumor to that effect and more than likely it would be brought up on the floor of the Senate, and I wanted them to go through every telegram and every letter; I wanted the vouchers for every dollar that was expended by every one who attended that convention, and I wanted, if possible, to find out on what ground the charge was based.

I will not stop to read the telegrams, because that is unnecessary, but I do want to call the attention of the Senate to a copy of the letters of instructions, which I shall read:

JANUARY 3, 1907.

Mr. EMIL GRANDJEAN, Boise, Idaho.

DEAR SIR:—

By the way, Mr. Grandjean was supervisor of the Payette and Sawtooth reserves.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. FLINT. The Senator is now addressing his remarks to the charge made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] that one of the foresters had charged his expenses in attending one of the national congresses to the hay and grain account.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is correct. The letter from Mr. James B. Adams, acting forester, dated January 3, 1907, is as follows:

Mr. EMIL GRANDJEAN, Boise, Idaho.

DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith a letter to Assistant Forest Ranger Henry A. Bergh—

This is the gentleman referred to by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]— which explains itself. Please deliver the letter to Mr. Bergh at once and give him the necessary vouchers for use on the trip.

It is expected that a number of important problems will come up at this meeting, and since it is Mr. Fenn's intention that Mr. Bergh act as stock ranger on the Payette and Sawtooth reserves, it is desired that he be present.

Very truly, yours, JAMES B. ADAMS,
Acting Forester.

Inclosure.

Now follows the letter to Mr. Bergh:

JANUARY 3, 1907.

Mr. HENRY A. BERGH,
(Through Acting Supervisor Grandjean, Boise, Idaho.)

DEAR SIR: The National Wool Growers' Association will hold a meeting at Salt Lake City, January 17–19. Mr. Pinchot and Mr. Potter will be present and will make their headquarters at the Kenyon Hotel. Since you are acting as stock ranger on the Payette and Sawtooth reserves, this meeting will be of much help to you in the work of next season, and you may consider this letter your instructions to attend. A special authorization will be issued to you to cover your travel and subsistence expenses on this trip, and will be charged to grazing. If the authorization does not reach you in time for you to begin the trip please do not wait for it. You should pay cash for any expenses incurred and take receipts therefor on vouchers which will be supplied you by Mr. Grandjean. Your expenses will be reimbursed you when your account is rendered on Form 4.

Very truly, yours, JAMES B. ADAMS, Acting Forester.

Mr. President, I have here the working plan of the Forest Service, and all the accounts are kept according to this plan. Here [indicating] the Senate will see is the division of the Forest Service. Standing at the head of it is the Forester. That is divided into two great systems, one grazing and the other operation. When the ranger received notice that his expenses were to be charged to grazing he knew that it was under the branch of grazing that the charge was to be made. He was so instructed, and any other man in the Service would have understood it the same way.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. I have given some study to the diagram the Senator has presented and I think it is very important that it should be placed in the RECORD. I suggest, though the Senator has not asked it, that the diagram be placed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like very much, if there is no objection, that it be placed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, if one objection will prevent it, I want to object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not insist on it. I certainly will yield my request to the judgment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. The other day some photographs were put in. They are entirely outside of the rule and ought not to be put in. I understand there are others to be offered, and I want to give notice now that I shall not permit, if I can help it, photographs being reproduced in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. This is not a photograph, but I shall not insist on it.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. FLINT. I want to state to the Senator from Colorado that this is not a photograph; it is simply a diagram, a working chart, showing how the employees in the Department are divided into various systems.

Mr. TELLER. It does not belong in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it go.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from California.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was not quite satisfied with the working plan of the Forest Service, so I asked that every voucher be submitted to me, for I wanted to see just exactly what the understanding of that forester was. Here is the account of Henry A. Bergh, and let me read it for the information of the Senate:

Itemized statement of traveling expenses, and station and field expenses incurred under stress of urgent and unforeseen public necessity.

Date.	Character of expenditures.	Sub-voucher No.—	Amount.
1907.
Jan. 16	One berth on sleeping car from Boise, Idaho, to Salt Lake City, Utah	1	$2.50
16	Supper on diner, $1; porter on sleeper, 25 cents		1.25
17	Breakfast on diner, $1; lunch, 25 cents; diuner, 70 cents		1.95
18	Breakfast, 65 cents; lunch, 25 cents; dinner, 75 cents		1.65
19	Breakfast, 45 cents; lunch, 65 cents; dinner, 90 cents		2.00
19	One berth on sleeper from Salt Lake City, Utah, to Boise, Idaho (night of 19–20)	2	2.50
20	Breakfast		1.00
20	Three nights' lodging at 75 cents (as per voucher)	3	2.25
20	To porter on Pullman sleeper		.25
20	Breakfast on Pullman diner		1.00
	Amount carried forward		16.35

I also have the vouchers here for every item charged.

Now, Mr. President, that trip cost $16.35; and as I read the items I thought to myself what right had anybody to claim that the forest rangers were living extravagantly. My experience has been that they do not loll around hotels, that they do not sail on yachts, that they are not demanding that bath houses be placed in their forest cabins. I have met these men at forest gatherings and in the forest reserves, and know them to be earnest workers in the protection of the interests of the people and the Government.

While upon this subject I want to say a word about the employees of the Forest Service. I wish that every Department of the Government had as loyal workers as the employees of the Forest Service. You may go upon a forest reserve in any State in this Union and meet the supervisor or the rangers and they talk of nothing else but the forest work.

Mr. President, I consider the Government very fortunate, indeed, in having a man like Hon. Gifford Pinchot at the head of this department. He is enthusiastic in the work; he is devoted to it; and I know that this enthusiasm and devotion is partaken of by every member of the Service. He has men as assistants who work early and late. All the rangers, office employees, and supervisors are enthusiasts in their particular lines of work.

I desire, Mr. President, to say that much in defense of these men, who have been accused of lolling around hotels and assuming the roll of lords of all creation. If there was half the energy expended by some of the pretended friends of forestry to effect a settlement wherever there is a complaint, or even lay before the Members of the Senate and the House information that they claim to have, as there is to criticise, I think it would be better for the Service and the people in general.

I notice in the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, Mr. LITTLEFIELD wanted to learn something about certain statements which had been made in this Chamber by certain Senators, and this is what he says regarding it:

Before our hearings were concluded, this Service became the subject of criticism upon the part of Members of the United States Senate. The alleged irresponsible character of this fund was referred to. Your committee immediately called the attention of the gentlemen making the criticisms to the fact that our hearings were not concluded and that we would have the Forester or anyone else connected with the Department before our committee, where they could be examined and cross-examined on oath for the purpose of developing all facts that might relate to the efficiency of the Department, the character of its organization, the propriety of its conduct, or the wisdom of its expenditure. None of the gentlemen desired to be present and cross-examine the officials of the Department.

Senator HEYBURN submitted to the committee a list of seventeen questions, which we herewith quote:

"1. How much land have you included in forest reserves upon which there is no merchantable timber?

"2. How much land have you included in forest reserves valuable principally for grazing?

"3. How much land have you included in forest reserves mineral in character?

"4. How many homestead entries have you included in forest reserves?

"5. How many public schools have you included in forest reserves?

"6. How many post-offices have you included in forest reserves?

"7. How much acreage of grazing lands have you granted permits for grazing stock upon?

"8. How many head of stock have you granted permits to graze upon per acre—giving the character of stock?

"9. How many acres of forest reserve have been withdrawn in each State and Territory, and what percentage of the total area of such State and Territory is forest reserve?

"10. How much timber in quantity, and value realized, has been sold by the Government from each reserve—given by State, reserve, and county?

"11. How much money has been realized from the grazing permits upon each reserve?

"12. How much money is now in the special fund resulting from sale of timber and grazing, stated separately?

"13. How many men are now employed in each department of the Forestry Service? State in detail and give full list, and compensation paid each man, by class.

"14. State in detail amounts paid out of special fund and for what purpose paid.

"15. State fully the permits issued for grazing upon forest reserves, giving the names and extent of the permit.

"16. State fully the quantity of land surrendered in each forest reserve, and by whom surrendered, for which lieu right of selection has been allowed, and to what extent such lieu selections have been made. State by whom such right to select lieu lands has been exercised, and where such lands have been selected. State what part of land surrendered as base for lieu selection has been merchantable timber land, what part has been grazing land, what part has been arid land, and upon what character of land the right of lieu selection has been exercised, and where.

"17. State the quantity of land represented by sections 16 and 36 included in forest reserves in each State and Territory."

Mr. SMOOT. The committee then say:

It will be seen that they all relate to the policy of the law and do not in any way reflect upon or suggest any criticism or give information in relation to any facts that would furnish the foundation for an examination of the Department in the line of the manner in which its business is conducted from an administrative and executive standpoint or as affecting its honesty or efficiency.

We proceeded to examine carefully the Forester on Saturday, February 16, using Senator HEYBURN'S memoranda as a basis of the examination, propounding during the course of the examination all of his questions and such others as occurred to us as calculated to develop any additional information. We were unable to elicit anything that in any way reflected upon the manner in which the affairs of this Bureau had been conducted.

Later, noticing that Senator HEYBURN made on Tuesday, February 19, the following statement in a speech in the Senate—

"If I am accurately informed—and I believe I am—a number of these forest rangers and employees had been brought there (Boise, where the Senator addressed a convention) and placed in a body in that meeting, as I believe, for the avowed purpose of interrupting its proceedings should I presume to express my views there. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 3340.)"

we recalled the Forester, Mr. Pinchot, and examined him specifically with reference to that statement. We found that Mr. Pinchot was on the platform at Boise, where the meeting took place; that there was a meeting of fifteen hundred or more people, and that some fifteen or twenty representatives of the Forest Service were in attendance for the purpose of conferring with the people who were interested in the reserves, getting their views in relation to the manner in which the reserves should be handled, answering questions and discussing generally the policy of the Department with a view to improving its efficiency and getting it nearer the people. We learned that Mr. Pinchot was on the platform when the Senator made the speech referred to and conferred with the Senator both before and after the speech, and that no complaint was made to him at the time by the Senator of the action of the representatives of his Service, and that no complaint had been made to him since in relation thereto, and that the first intimation he had ever heard that the employees of the Department were supposed to have been guilty of such conduct, or believed to be guilty of such conduct, was in the speech made by the Senator on Tuesday, February 19.

Mr. Pinchot testified that he saw no signs of the men who were connected with his Service engaging in the conduct referred to, and that he would not tolerate any such conduct, and that if he could be shown that any representative of his Service had on that or any other occasion had any of the rangers or employees of the Forest Service present for any purpose of that kind, or had authorized them to engage in any such conduct, that he would immediately discharge such representative of the Bureau.

To the statement made in the Senate that a man must get a permit before he can enter a forest reserve to reach his own property, Mr. Pinchot stated that the contrary was the fact, and that the law specially provided "that the forest reserves shall be open to all persons for all lawful purposes." The statement that the Government is selling timber and collecting grazing fees from State lands in Idaho he stated also was an error. (880.)

We have no hesitation in saying, so far as we have been able to examine this Bureau from the testimony of its officials on oath before us, and our personal inspection of the work (and we do not say that either has been complete and exhaustive, because the time at our disposal has been clearly inadequate for that purpose, but so far as our examination has gone) we do not hesitate to say that we heartily concur in the conclusions testified to by Mr. Garfield with reference to the efficiency and character of this Bureau.

We should not have gone into this matter in detail and selected this Bureau for illustration as distinguished from other bureaus in the Department of Agriculture, in all of which we found officials that were able, intelligent, and expert in the work of their respective bureaus, had it not been for the fact that it was made the special object of criticism and attack.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not only vote to include the $500,000 which is now provided for in this bill for permanent improvements, but ask that the Senate increase the amount to $1,000,000. They are permanent improvements, and every dollar thus spent will give greater security to the Government's property. It will enable the supervisors and rangers to know what is going on in any part of any forest reserve in this country. Mr. President, I hope that an amendment will be offered increasing the amount from $500,000 to $1,000,000 at least.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If it will not disturb the Senator, as he proposes to increase this sum from $500,000 to $1,000,000, I wish to ask him if he would be willing to specify in the amendment for what the $1,000,000 is to be used?

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly would; and I want to say here that in the hearings before the House committee the Forester stated just exactly what use would be made of these additional funds and exactly where they would be spent.

Mr. President, I was going into the question of the expenses and returns of the Forest Service, but I see that time is flying and I shall not burden the Senate with it. Mr. President, it is not the policy of the Forest Service to make money out of the forest reserves. The intention is to preserve the reserves; and when I speak of preservation of the reserves I do not mean nonuse of the reserves, but absolutely the contrary.

It was intimated yesterday by a Western Senator that the sole purpose of the Forest Service was to make money, and that the only reason there are not more grazing permits issued is because of the lack of applications. Mr. President, the only complaints that I have ever heard of the Forest Service in my State have been because it was impossible for the applicants to secure permits to graze all the sheep and cattle they desired. I know men in my State who years ago had fifteen to twenty thousand head of sheep who to-day, through this system, have been compelled to dispose of them and not to carry more than 2,000 head; and where formerly there was one man using the reserve, there are at least ten men using it to-day. So the Forest Service is for and not against the interests of the people.

Mr. President, I know, so far as revenue is concerned, that the Forest Division could make millions of dollars over and above the expenses of maintaining the reserves if that were its policy. I believe this coming year the revenues from the forest reserves of this country will amount to $2,500,000.

This bill proposes to make an appropriation of $3,796,200, and I hope, as I have said, that $500,000 more will be added to it. If it is, I expect to live to see the day when the men who have stood the brunt of establishing this great forest system will be called blessed by the people, and the memory of Gifford Pinchot will not only live for this generation, but it will live as long as the American people read history.

The Forest Division has no desire to conceal the name of a single person in its employ nor for what purpose employed.

It has been intimated, if not directly charged, that the Forest Service puts influential men upon its pay rolls in order to make illegitimate use of their influence. The utter absurdity of this charge is evidenced by the fact that with the exceptions hereinafter noted, all members of the Forest Service enter it only after examination by the Civil Service Commission, aimed specifically at determining their fitness for the work upon which they are employed. This charge, therefore, is, in effect, a charge of collusion between the appointee, the Forest Service, and the United States Civil Service Commission. It is, moreover, a charge against the Secretary of Agriculture, who approves all appointments of members of the Forest Service, no appointment in that Service being possible except by the action of the Secretary.

Those employees of the Forest Service who enter it without examination are forest guards, employed in manual labor upon the national forests at a salary of $75 a month. The influence of these men, who are engaged in building roads and trails, fighting fires, and in other subordinate capacities, upon the press, upon Members of Congress, and upon legislation, is presumably not far-reaching.

The collaborators of the Forest Service are also appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture, without examination. They are selected from among men eminent in forestry outside of the Government service, or in associated lines of work, and appointed to carry on special lines of investigation. They are paid either on a per diem basis, in no case exceeding $5 per day, for the days actually employed, or at the munificent salary of $25 per month.

Their names, occupations, rate of remuneration, and the work that they are performing are as follows, and I ask that they be placed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The list referred to is as follows:

H. P. Parker, professor of forestry, Pennsylvania State College: Salary from the Forest Service $525 a year, for which he conducts experiments and research work in forest planting in Pennsylvania.

F. W. Besley, State forester for Maryland: Salary from the Forest Service $300 per annum, for which he conducts experiments in forest planting in Maryland.

Austin Cary, professor of forestry, Lawrence Scientific School, Harvard University: Salary from the Forest Service $300 per annum, for which he reports upon forest conditions and methods of lumbering in New England.

G. L. Clothier, professor of forestry, Mississippi Agricultural College: Salary from the Forest Service $625 per annum, for which he makes experiments in forest planting and lectures on care of wood lots at farmers' institutes.

H. S. Graves, director, Yale Forest School: Salary from the Forest Service $300 per annum. Inspects work on national forests and cooperative work with private landowners. Has written Part I of Bulletin 36, The Woodsman's Handbook, and is now engaged in the preparation of Part II.

R. S. Hosmer, superintendent of forestry, Hawaii: Salary from the Forest Service $300 per annum. Collects information and plant material of species suitable for planting in the subtropical regions of the United States.

G. B. Lull, State forester for California: Salary from the Forest Service $300 per annum, for which he advises concerning forest planting and collects information on eucalyptus in California.

R. S. Mackintosh, professor of horticulture at the Alabama Polytechnic Institute: Paid by the Forest Service $4 per diem for the time actually employed. Examines and reports upon woodlands and lectures on care of wood lots before farmers' institutes.

F. J. Phillips, professor of forestry, University of Nebraska: Employed by the Service during the summer, at the rate of $108.33 per month, as forest assistant. Engaged in experimental and research work for the Forest Service in forest planting in Nebraska.

J. W. Toumey, professor of forestry, Yale Forest School: Salary from the Forest Service $300 per annum. Inspects and studies forest planting on the national forests.

A. L. Dean, expert chemist, Boston: Collaborator, at $300 per year. Until June 30, 1907, was chief, section of wood chemistry; is retained during present fiscal year to complete unfinished reports.

William F. Fox, superintendent of State forests of New York: Collaborator, at $300 per year. Assists actively in collection of annual statistics on the production of forest products. The Forest Service and the Bureau of the Census collect such statistics for the entire United States and depend wholly upon Mr. Fox for the statistics on lumber cut from the State of New York.

William C. Geer, expert chemist, Akron, Ohio: Collaborator, at $5 per day for the time actually employed. Till July 31, 1907, he was in charge of wood-distillation studies, at a salary of $1,500 per year, and gave his full time to the work. He has been retained at the rate of $5 per day during time actually employed in order to complete reports that were unfinished when he left the Service. The amount paid him as collaborator since August 1, 1907, is $120.

George K. Smith, secretary National Lumber Manufacturers' Association, St. Louis, Mo.: Collaborator, at $300 per annum. Assists Forest Service and the Bureau of the Census in the collection of annual statistics of forest products.

W. L. Jepson, assistant professor in botany, University of California: Salary from the Forest Service $300 per annum, for which he is making studies and preparing reports on certain trees of the Pacific coast and their commercial products.

William L. Bray, professor of botany, University of Texas: Salary from the Forest Service $300 per annum, for which he is making special studies of Texas trees and forests.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the following members of the National Advisory Board on Fuels and Structural Materials are paid by the Forest Service:

J. F. Deems, C. B. Dudley, Charles A. Hexamer, Robert M. Hunt, Francis B. Cracker, William G. Irvine, H. G. Kelley, Hunter McDonald, George B. Post, and John L. Kaul.

They receive $5 per day for the time actually employed. The entire sum paid them during the fiscal year 1907 was $322.50, and during the current fiscal year $359.22.

The National Advisory Board on Fuels and Structural Materials was appointed by the President early in 1906 for the purpose of giving advice and suggestions to the Forest Service and the Geological Survey in regard to their tests on structural materials and fuels. It is composed of representatives from seventeen national associations and technical societies, such as the American Institute of Mining Engineers, the American Society of Civil Engineers, the American Society for Testing Materials, the American Railway Engineering and Maintenance of Way Association, the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association, and so forth, together with representatives from a number of the Government bureaus which are largely engaged in construction work, such as the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, the Isthmian Canal Commission, the Reclamation Service, the Supervising Architect's Office, and so forth.

The purpose of the President in appointing this board is set forth in his letter to the individuals composing it, inviting them to become members, which was as follows:

The United States Government, through the Geological Survey and the Forest Service, is engaged in investigating the properties and best methods of use of building materials and fuels of the United States. These investigations are so intimately connected with the industries and welfare of the nation that they should be carried forward as rapidly as possible, and should have the advantage of the best service and cooperation which is possible to secure. Accordingly, I have decided to invite selected members of the national engineering societies and allied organizations to form, with representatives of such Government bureaus as are carrying on actual construction work, an Advisory Board on Fuels and Structural Materials, and I invite you and your successors * * * to become members of it. The times and places of meeting and other details will be arranged through the Director of the Geological Survey and the Chief of the Forest Service. Once each year during the remainder of the present Administration the board shall report to the President its suggestions and recommendations, and from time to time each year I shall be glad for each member of the board to give to the Director of the Geological Survey and the Chief of the Forest Service, or to those who are directly charged with the investigation, such suggestions as will best forward the objects of the work. At the beginning of each year the plans for the investigations proposed will be submitted to the members of the board for their consideration, suggestions, and advice.

The personnel of the entire board is given in the following list:

LIST OF MEMBERS NATIONAL ADVISORY BOARD ON FUELS AND STRUCTURAL MATERIALS.

From the American Institute of Mining Engineers.—John Hays Hammond, past president, Empire Building, New York; Robert W. Hunt (of Robert W. Hunt & Co., testing engineers, Chicago, Pittsburg, and New York), Chicago, Ill.; B. F. Bush, manager and vice-president, Western Coal and Mining Company, St. Louis, Mo.; E. V. D'Invilliers, mining engineer, 506 Walnut street, Philadelphia, Pa.

From the American Institute of Electrical Engineers.—Francis B. Crocker, professor of electrical engineering, Columbia University, New York; Henry C. Stott, superintendent motive power, Interborough Rapid Transit Company, Eleventh avenue and Fifty-ninth street, New York.

From the American Society of Civil Engineers.—C. C. Schneider, president, chairman committee on concrete and reenforced concrete, Pennsylvania Building, Philadelphia, Pa.; George B. Webster, chairman committee on cement specifications, city engineer, City Hall, Philadelphia, Pa.

From the American Society of Mechanical Engineers.—W. F. M. Goss, dean of the school of engineering, Purdue University, Lafayette, Ind.; George H. Barrus, steam engineer, Pemberton square, Boston, Mass.; P. W. Gates, 210 State street, Chicago, Ill.

From the American Society for Testing Materials.—Charles B. Dudley, president, Altoona, Pa.; Robert W. Lesley, vice-president, Pennsylvania Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

From the American Institute of Architects.—George B. Post, past president, 33 East Seventeenth street, New York; William S. Eames, past president, Lincoln Trust Building, St. Louis, Mo.

From the American Railway Engineering and Maintenance of Way Association.—H. G. Kelly, president, Minneapolis, Minn.; Julius Kruttschnitt, director of maintenance and operation, Union Pacific Railroad, 135 Adams street, Chicago, Ill.; Hunter McDonald, past president, chief engineer Nashville, Chattanooga and St. Louis Railway, Nashville, Tenn.

From the American Railway Master Mechanics' Association.—J. F. Deems, general superintendent of motive power, New York Central lines, Grand Central Station, New York; A. W. Gibbs, general superintendent of motive power, Pennsylvania Railroad, Altoona, Pa.

From the American Foundrymen's Association.—Richard Moldenke, secretary, Watchung, N. J.

From the Association of American Portland Cement Manufacturers.—John B. Lober, president, Land Title Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

From the Geological Society of America.—Samuel Calvin, professor of geology, University of Iowa, Iowa City, Iowa; I. C. White, State geologist, Morgantown, W. Va.

From the Iron and Steel Institute.—Julian Kennedy, metallurgical engineer, Pittsburg, Pa.; C. S. Robinson, vice-president, Youngstown, Sheet and Tube Company, Youngstown, Ohio.

From the National Association of Cement Users.—Richard L. Humphrey, president, St. Louis, Mo.

From the National Board of Fire Underwriters.—Charles A. Hexamer, chairman board of consulting experts, Bullitt Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

From the National Fire Protective Association.—E. U. Crosby, chairman executive committee, Philadelphia, Pa.

From the National Brick Manufacturers' Association.—John W. Sibley, treasurer, Sibley-Menge Press Brick Company, Birmingham, Ala.; William D. Gates, American Terra Cotta and Ceramic Company, Chicago, Ill.

From the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association.—William Irvine, president, Chippewa Falls, Wis.; John L. Kaul, president Southern Lumber Manufacturers' Association, Birmingham, Ala.

From the Ordnance Bureau, United States Army.—Gen. William Crozier, Chief, Washington, D. C.

From the Corps of Engineers, United States Army.—Lieut. Col. William L. Marshall, Army Building, New York.

From the Bureau of Steam Engineering, United States Navy.—Admiral Charles W. Rae, Chief, Washington, D. C.

From the Bureau of Yards and Docks, United States Navy.—Frank T. Chambers, civil engineer, Washington, D. C.

From the Supervising Architect's Office, United States Treasury Department.—James K. Taylor, Supervising Architect, Washington, D. C.

From the United States Reclamation Service.—F. H. Newell, chief engineer, Washington, D. C.

From the Isthmian Canal Commission.—John F. Stevens, chief engineer, Washington, D. C.

Mr. President, I also have a great number of letters from private citizens of Arizona, Idaho, Utah, and New Mexico and leading newspaper editorials from almost every State where there is a forest reserve, commending the policy of the establishment of these reserves; and, if there is no objection, I should like to put in the RECORD a few letters, petitions, and editorials, so that Senators can see how some of the influential newspapers and leading citizens in Western States feel in relation to this great Service and the benefits accruing from it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The letters referred to are as follows:

[From James W. Clyde, Joseph R. Murdock, E. J. Cummings, J. C. Jensen (cashier bank), Abram Hatch, Wilford Van Morgan.]

W. I. PACK, Esq., Forest Supervisor, Provo, Utah.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request for an expression of our views regarding the policy of the Government in converting the public domain into forest reserves, to be operated under the supervision of the Forestry Department, and its relation to the interests of the people of Wasatch County, we have pleasure in submitting our unqualified indorsement, not only of the policy of creating such reserves, but also of the manner in which those with which we are familiar are being conducted.

We feel that our thorough acquaintance with the conditions which have existed on the former Uintah Indian Reservation and the public domain for the past twenty-five years qualifies us to judge understandingly the effects upon the interests of the community since a part of said reservation has been made a forest reserve as compared with the benefits which the people received from said lands before, and it is our opinion that far greater advantages and benefits result from the manipulation of the public domain in the form of forest reserves under the Government direction than were or are possible under the unrestricted use of the ranges by the public.

It has been our observation, as well as experience, that where ranges have been open to promiscuous public use and occupancy, they become in a very short time overstocked and destroyed and of practically no value to anyone. Too frequently, also, the owners of the larger herds crowd their less prosperous neighbors off; while under the supervision of the Forestry department, whereby the grazing upon the several districts of the forest reserves is limited to the reasonable capacity of such district, together with the policy of reducing the privileges of the larger stock growers as rapidly as consistent with justice and without undue hardship to them, and substituting in their places men of more limited requirements, is decidedly more advantageous to the people generally and to these having small herds especially.

In our opinion it would be advantageous to still further extend the Uintah Forest Reserve by adding to it the remainder of the public domain now in the former Uintah Indian Reservation, and in this connection we recommend that the lands in the Strawberry Valley reserved for reclamation purposes be placed under the regulation of the Forestry department.

We wish at this time to express our appreciation of the labors of the officers who have had and now are in charge of the regulations of the Uintah Forest Reserve, and to commend them for their efforts to equitably and justly adjust and fix the privileges granted on that reserve.

Very respectfully,

JAMES W. CLYDE.
JOSEPH R. MURDOCK.
E. J. CUMMINGS.
J. C. JENSEN, Cashier Bank.
ABRAM HATCH.
WILFORD VAN MORGAN.

[From Aquila Nebeker, Laketown, Utah, June 3, 1907.]

LAKETOWN, UTAH, June 3, 1907.

Mr. W. W. CLARK,
Supervisor Bear River Forest Reserve, Logan, Utah.

DEAR SIR: To your inquiries relative to whether or not there has been an increase in the weights of the product of cattle and sheep, and as to the general condition of the ranges since coming under National Forest regulations as compared with its condition before said regulations were in force and effect, have this to say:

1. Unquestionably the weights of cattle and sheep are increasing from year to year. The condition is the result of two causes; first, range is better and therefore the most important cross to the practical farmer, viz., the "cross of good feed" exists; and second, sheep men and cattle men are striving to increase the quality of their herds and flocks by using better blooded sires (one condition is the concomitant of the other). Of course both causes contribute to the above effect, but in my twenty-five years of range experience I would be very loath to attempt to expect better results by breeding alone and on a decreasing quality of range. There is another feature I desire to call to your attention. The ranges in the Logan Reserve are supporting to-day nearly, if not quite, as many sheep and cattle as they were before National Forest regulations went into effect, and they all are in better condition.

Now, I imagine I can hear some individual who may object to said regulations stand up and holler, "Absurd!" and exclaim, "These are the fellows who are favorable to your control" and that "they do not know what they are talking about." But to all such I would say to suspend their criticisms a few moments and let us reason a little together. First. Is it not natural for us all to be more solicitous of the condition of something we own as against that which we do not own? The districting of the ranges under permit regulations makes of the user a party in interest to said range. Second. Is it not a fact that much of the feed on the open ranges has been worn out by herds traveling to and fro, rather than being consumed through the stomach of the animal, and thereby contributing to the production of mutton and wool? Any observant range user, if he will be fair, will admit both of the above statements without argument. Third. The national-forest regulations go far to prevent the wearing-out process mentioned in my second question by fixing a locus for the range user, thereby permitting him to conserve his range and getting its benefits as to him seems reasonable, without fear of some one else getting that which could be used at some other time or in some other manner to much better advantage.

The cattle are in better flesh in the fall of the year, since regulations, than they have been for years at that season in the past. This is no wild statement, but is a fact conceded by everyone who has had occasion to take notice. Also, and not an unimportant item either, the friction and ill feeling usually prevailing between cattlemen and sheepmen is being fast overcome, and these old-time prejudices of cattlemen against their brother sheepman's industry is fast becoming a condition of the past. The writer was at one time possessed of as much prejudice on this subject as anyone. He has moved from Arizona to northern Utah and back to Arizona with cattle to escape meeting a sheep or sheepman. But I say to you, if national-forest regulations and forest reserves had been in existence the past twenty-five years as they are to-day, he would have been saved much peace of mind and at times a condition bordering on crime. As to increase of weights, I would call anyone's attention who desires to investigate, to the records of national stock yards of shipments of sheep and lambs from our section for several years past. Those records will disclose that our lambs, before regulations averaging 60 pounds, and our yearlings averaging 90 pounds, are now averaging for lambs 65 pounds and for yearlings from 95 to 100 pounds (weighed at Omaha). Many bunches of our March lambs marketed in August average 75 pounds. So, as to range, I can unhesitatingly say to you that it is improving, and although we are paying in part for its administration by grazing fees, I regard the compensating benefits outweigh the cost.

Another thing which may not be out of place to mention in this connection: I have been acquainted with the Bear Lake side of the Logan Forest Reserve for over thirty years. In all that time before regulation there has hardly ever been a year when there has not been great fires in that section, devastating hundred of acres of timber. The last timber fire we had occurred the summer the lands went under regulation and was extinguished by the Department officials, and, I believe, was about their first work. While you people can not prevent lightning from striking and fires from being sometimes started, but by parties being located in the section, whose business it is to do what they can to prevent fires, and if started to put them out, millions of feet of timber is being preserved for future use.

To conclude, will say that if the users of the ranges are willing to pay a reasonable fee for compensating advantages, and the taxpayer a reasonable amount for his future timber supply being preserved to him and his children, the National Forest regulations can not be viewed as simply a part of the Government to provide jobs for politicians out of employment, as is now sometimes designated.

The sales certificates verifying the within-mentioned weights I have at my home, at Laketown, of my own shipments, which, if you will favor me with a visit, I shall be pleased to show you.

As to per cent of increase: With cattle and horses, I can not say that there is any material increase further than what would naturally follow by the breeding stock being in general better condition. With sheep, yes, there is a decided increase of lambs from our breeding ewes, but this result is more the effect of lambing at home in sheds provided for that purpose rather than any condition existing on the range. By such lambing I would fix the increase in lambs fully 16 per cent.

Respectfully,

AQUILA NEBEKER.

[From Robert Scott, address, Show Low, Ariz., date, June 4, 1907.]

Mr. F. S. BREEN, Forest Supervisor, Flagstaff.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the benefits derived from grazing sheep upon the national forest reserves, personally I am glad to say that my range is in better condition than it has been for years, and I attribute its good condition to the Forest Service regulations. The results have been that I have raised a greater per cent of lambs and the loss of old stock from shortage of feed has been nothing, and I would regret very much if I thought that we would have to go back to the old style of running sheep before the Forest Service regulations were established. As it is now, when we leave our ranges in the fall we know that it will not be fed off by other herds, and in place of seeing bare ground and sheep tracks, we see green feed.

Yours, truly,

ROBERT SCOTT.

[From J. W. Brough, Nephi, Utah, June 4, 1907.]

Mr. A. F. POTTER, Denver, Colo.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your information asked as regards to the reserve, I will say it has increased nearly one-half with feed. The cattle come down looking well in the fall. Previous to this being a reserve they came down very poor, on account of scarcity of feed, and our loss on cattle was 10 per cent. Now, we do not have 3 per cent, and the growth of cattle has increased 20 per cent; the water has increased one-third more. I do not think this reserve is able to carry any more stock than those that are raised on the farm; if it does that it will suit the majority of the people.

J. W. BROUGH.

[From the Idaho Daily Statesman, Thursday, April 2, 1908.]

MISREPRESENTING THE WEST.

It is not flattering to the people of the West that some of their representatives in Congress should be continually fighting the policy of the National Administration in its efforts to conserve the natural resources of the country. The West, more than any other section, has been made a beneficiary of this policy and it must be hard for the country at large to understand why its people should seem to be forever protesting against a policy that so plainly confers great benefits upon them. The people of the East are not likely to remember that the West, like every other section of the country, has private interests selfish enough to oppose any policy that does not directly benefit them, or which takes from them some of the special privileges that they had previously enjoyed, and that these interests, like interests elsewhere, are represented by men in Congress who look out for them first, and for the people afterwards.

The great majority of the thinking people of the West are not opposed to the Government's forest-reserve policy and they must resent the attempt now being made in the National House of Representatives to show that the policy is unpopular here. The masses of our people fully realize that the National Government has aided them immeasurably by protecting their water and timber supplies and providing for the reclamation of vast tracts of arid lands, and that instead of "building a Federal fence around the public domain," as charged by Congressman CUSHMAN, of Washington, it has opened to settlement tracts heretofore inaccessible.

Such a charge is in fact absurd and misleading, for it must be remembered that the placing of the public domain in forest reserves does not shut agricultural land off from settlement, but rather opens it to settlement. The regulations provide that any land in a forest reserve shown to be better adapted for agricultural purposes than for timber land may be homesteaded, and as the Government has built roads through the national forests and established telephone communication with many out-of-the-way regions, a large acreage has been made desirable for homes that would never have been developed under the old conditions. It should be remembered, also, that the public domain belongs to the Government, representing the whole people, instead of to a few who feel that they should have special rights upon it, and that therefore it makes no difference whether a certain portion of the public domain is in a national forest or not, so long as no one is robbed of a privilege that really belongs to him.

But, some opponent of the Administration will say, we have been robbed of privileges that really belong to us. Analyze this complaint and you will find that some one merely has been denied some special privilege that he thought belonged to him because he had been permitted to use it for years at the expense of the general public. The fact of the matter is that the regulations governing the national forests are so liberally formed that the few can not benefit at the expense of the many in the reserves, and so there is naturally a resentment against the regulations in certain quarters.

Everybody knows that at the present rate of consumption our timber will not last more than from twenty to thirty years longer unless steps be taken to preserve the young growth, yet we have men so short-sighted as to maintain that this makes no difference, that what the West needs is the earliest possible development of its resources and that future generations should be left to look out for themselves. But even if this were true, there would be no merit in the charge that development has been stopped on account of the Administration's policy to conserve the natural resources. Development has not been stopped in the West by any action of the Government, but has been aided by it along many lines unusual in a republic.

As Representative HEPBURN, of Iowa, pointed out in the debate in the House Tuesday, the agricultural lands of the older sections of the country are being improved by a succession of their title from the Government, but "it was an act of largess upon the part of the Government to improve the waste spaces and make them blossom into fertile lands for the benefit of all the people." That is a fact that should be constantly borne in mind by the people of the West. They should remember that vast sums were voted to them for the improvement of their desert areas and the preservation of their forests by men representing States that had enjoyed no such benefits, but who were broad enough to rise above selfish considerations and make possible to a progressive people in a new country a development which they could not otherwise have attained for years. They should remember, moreover, that the present National Administration has understood the West more thoroughly than any other Administration the country has ever had, and that it was largely through its efforts that these great benefits were conferred upon them. And remembering these things they should make it plain that they do not uphold the vicious attacks that are so constantly being made upon the National Government by the representatives of special interests because of private grievances.

It is a disgrace to the West that its people should be made to appear so ungrateful for what has been done for them, and they should lose no opportunity to show the country that they are being shamefully misrepresented by some of their public servants.

NATIONAL RESERVE POLICY.

Ever since the adoption by our Government of its policy to protect and regulate the use of our forests and grazing lands, a continual round of objection and criticism has been indulged in by the public in many localities. But when both sides of the question are presented, it would seem that the Government is doing nothing but its duty to the present generation and making a wise provision for posterity in taking charge of our Government domain in a manner that will give the greatest possible good to the greatest possible number of people. A government based upon any other hypothesis would be unsound and dangerous. There are governments now in existence whose laws and whose policies throw the power and benefits into the hands of the few to the exclusion of the many, but these forms of government are not nor ever will be our ideals. Our Government forest policy is one of vast proportions, and in many instances it is as yet in a crude form and it will require time and many experiments to get it down to a harmonious basis. When we consider that under past conditions our forests would be denuded of timber in twenty-five years, it is very easy to understand the avidity with which the timber barons were gobbling up every available tract of timber land and the fraudulent methods by which they sought to acquire them. Place the control of our forest lands in the hands of these barons and the country would soon face a trust whose magnitude would be appalling. For the general good of the country, far better leave the control of the situation in the hands of the General Government than to eventually be squeezed by a trust more soulless and gigantic than the Standard Oil, with all of its kindred tentacles. It is true that seemingly in many instances it may seem annoying to be compelled to go to some forestry agent for permission to cut a few cords of wood for family use; but would conditions be any the less onerous were we compelled to go down upon our knees and beg this same privilege from some haughty timber baron, who certainly would have less consideration for our personal welfare and comfort than our own Government? Should conditions be allowed to drift as in the past, in a few years we would be compelled to face conditions as are faced to-day in Germany, England, France, Russia, and many other countries, where the common people are glad to glean the twigs from the forests for fuel after the owner had disposed of the body of the tree to the individual whose wealth would enable him to buy it. Better by far be patient under present conditions than to face the inevitable.

In regard to our grazing lands, these, too, were being gobbled up at an alarming rate and in a few years the stock business would have been corralled and held under absolute control of the grass barons. Better by far pay a small fee to a government that should be our friend than to ask for favors from private individuals who, in too many instances, believe in a "public-be-damned" policy. There is no question but under proper conditions more stock can be herded upon our public domain than under the old system where might was law. We are constrained in too many instances to look at these questions in a selfish and personal light, losing sight of the rights of others. If a mistake has been committed by the Government, it is that this policy was not established twenty years ago, and to-day, instead of grazing upon the barren, sun-blistered hillsides, the old familiar succulent bunch grass would still be waving in the sunlight. Overstocking our public pastures without suitable regulations would go further toward putting an end to the stock business than anything else, and proper regulation toward the use of our grazing lands will eventually rebuild this industry upon a solid and permanent basis. That the Government forestry policy has come to stay is beyond question, and it makes very little difference as to who succeeds Mr. Roosevelt as President, the public will never permit a backward step in this direction, but it will be carried forward and the public will soon be proud of the day when it was first suggested.

[From the Salt Lake City (Utah) Republican, January 18, 1908.]

POLICY IS ALL RIGHT.

It is not going to be easy for the gentlemen at Helena to make the people believe that President Roosevelt has been holding to a policy harmful to the nation, or unfair to the men who want to plant homes in the West.

In spite of all the clamor that may be made against the President, made by stockmen who want more than the law allows them, the people are going to ask: Does this forestry policy of the President permit actual settlers to found a home in the forest reserve? Does it permit an American citizen to locate and perfect title? Does it afford the manhood and the womanhood of the Republic the homestead rights which have been theirs from the founding of the nation?

And the answer will have to be affirmative in each case. The Government has not prevented any actual settler from establishing a home wherever on the public land—even the forest reserve—he may select a place. It has in every way encouraged his making a home. The Government idea has been that actual settlers are more to be desired, are of more value to the nation, than is stock. It is believed the nation would be better for the settlement and development, the farming and cultivation of the land, than for any amount of pasturing. It is believed this big range, now becoming so valuable, would be better in farms than in pasture land.

And while the stockmen are going to receive justice, they will not be allowed to stand in the way of the development, the reclaiming, and the enrichment of any part of the public domain.

THE ATTACKS ON PINCHOT.

The attacks on Chief Forester Gifford Pinchot, made in the House Monday by Congressmen MONDELL of Wyoming and SMITH of California, appear to be a continuation of the programme inaugurated at the convention held in Denver a few months ago. At that time, it will be remembered, the various forces throughout the West that are opposed for one reason or another to the Federal forestry policy got together and made a noise entirely disproportionate to their importance. They got the support of the Denver papers and succeeded in flooding the country with dispatches designed to create the impression that Colorado in particular and the West in general were simply boiling over with indignation against the President, Mr. Pinchot, Secretary Garfield, and everybody else concerned in the work of preventing the wholesale destruction of what remains of the American forests.

It is perfectly safe to say that this view does not correctly represent the attitude of the West, and it may also be assumed that Western opinion does not indorse the position of the Congressmen who are now leveling their heavy artillery on the Chief of the Forestry Bureau. Mr. Pinchot is by far the most capable and efficient man that has ever had charge of this work; he is a trained forester of long experience, with a reputation in his profession that extends beyond the borders of this country, and his integrity has never been called into question. It is due more to him than to anybody else that the nation has at last been awakened to the vital importance of protecting the forests, an object which can not be attained without the creation of vast reserves, or national forests as they are officially known. It is perfectly natural that the setting aside of these tracts should arouse opposition among those individuals and corporations which have been and still are exploiting them for their own profit. It is undeniable that some minor injustices have been done in pursuance of this policy, but many of them have been corrected as soon as they were brought to the attention of the proper authorities, and there is no reason to believe that any of them will be permanent.

APPROVE POLICY OF PRESERVING STATE FORESTS—THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE ADOPTS RESOLUTION FAVORING SERVICE—PROTEST AGAINST CIRCULATION OF REPORT THAT THE WEST IS AGAINST PINCHOT—ORGANIZATION ALSO VOTES FOR ANTERO WATER FOR DENVER'S BENEFIT.

Realizing the importance of preserving the forests of Colorado and approving of the policy of the present Administration on that problem, the board of directors of the Denver Chamber of Commerce last night indorsed the following resolution:

"Of the many issues so forcibly presented by the able and vigorous Executive of our National Administration on questions of public policy, none is of more vital interest or more far-reaching in its effects upon present and future generations than the question of the conservation of our forests, already sadly decimated, affecting, as it does, our water supply, the basis of all our material wealth, agriculture, manufactures, and even life itself. While we may differ in minor details as to the administration of our forestry laws and in the regulations and uses of public lands and streams, we must subordinate these minor differences to the central idea—the preservation of the small remnant of the splendid heritage which was once ours, and jealously guard what yet remains of our forest possessions.

"We therefore strongly protest against the general prevailing idea that the people of the West are not in full accord and sympathy with the Forestry Service of the Agricultural Department of the United States in their efforts to preserve to us and to our posterity that which affects the very life forces of the nation itself, and we hope the time may come when the feelings of the public may become so aroused on this question as to compel by statutory enactment the replanting of a new tree for every old tree destroyed, as is now the law in many European countries: Therefore be it

UPHOLD FORESTRY SERVICE AND URGE ITS CONTINUANCE.

"Resolved, That we indorse and uphold the policy of the Forestry Service of the Agricultural Department of the United States in their effort toward forest preservation, and urge the continuance of such efforts in the shape of rules and regulations as will accomplish the end to be desired with the minimum of loss and inconvenience to those interests that may be affected thereby.

"Resolved, That we recommend to our Representatives in Congress their support of such measures and appropriations as may be necessary to the proper and successful safeguarding of public land and streams: Be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial and resolutions be sent to our Members in Congress, to the honorable Secretary of Agriculture, and to the Hon. Gifford Pinchot, whose patriotic efforts so largely added to the advances made in forestry and forest preservation in recent years.

"W. A. HOVER.
"F. J. CHAMBERLAIN.
"ZEPH CHARLES FELT.
"DAVID BROTHERS."

The board also indorsed the resolution of its committee on the Antero and Lost Park reservoirs, in which the committee advised that all means be taken to induce the owners of the reservoir sites to bring the water to the lands east of Denver rather than send it down the Platte River into another county.

THE RAID ON THE FORESTS.

Representative SMITH is doing himself no good when he takes service alongside of the Congressional contingent which is so active in forwarding the schemes of the timber thieves and franchise grabbers who are striving to loot what is left of the national domain. The purposes of that endeavor have become perfectly well understood all over the country and the hypocrisy of their appeal to State pride only excites contempt. Their purpose is purely selfish.

The national Forestry Service has stood like a lion in the path of these freebooters and, accordingly, their advocates in Congress are engaged in an attack all along the line on that Department of the Government. They seek to cripple it by withholding the necessary appropriations. They do not hesitate to spread false charges, and they use every device that political ingenuity can invent. It is a dirty business and it is regrettable to see Mr. SMITH enlisted in the ranks of their Congressional supporters. Quite possibly he is there by mistake.

The conflict of testimony between SMITH and Pinchot appears to have settled itself disastrously for the California Representative. It seems as if Mr. SMITH might have some just cause of quarrel with his colleagues of the California delegation. In this instance they appear to have made the mistake—from the politician's point of view—of putting themselves down in black and white and delivering up their scalps to Gifford Pinchot, all except JULIUS KAHN, who, as usual, was concealed somewhere in the brush and could not be found. It was, of course, due to an unhappy lapse of memory that they committed themselves so unreservedly to Mr. SMITH. Some Congressmen should have good memories.

The trouble with SMITH is that he is unable to understand that he is getting in the way of a great national movement, and if he does not look out he stands an excellent chance of being run over. It does not pay to tie up with a bad crowd.

THE GOOD OF FOREST PRESERVATION.

The question of the preservation of the present timber supply of the United States and the extension of its forests is assuming greater and more important proportions as time advances and as the subject is becoming better known and better understood by the intelligent people of the country.

The United States began taking care of what little in the forest line is left at a rather late day in its history. For a century and a quarter the destruction of most valuable timber resources in Uncle Sam's dominions was ruthless, and, in fact, in many cases criminal to the highest degree. Fortunately, for the good of the country, for the saving of its water supply, and for the protection of billions of property and millions of lives, the stop came not too soon.

It is believed by experts that had the destruction which has been in vogue for the past century and a quarter kept up for the next twenty-five years this country would have been virtually stripped of its timber supply and forests. Referring to a circular recently published by the Bureau of Forestry, entitled "What Forestry Has Done," a highly interesting story is told by the experts of the Bureau, and this brochure should be read and carefully studied, especially in the Rocky Mountain States and Territories. The Pueblo Chieftain reviews the contents of this very valuable pamphlet correctly and timely when it says that uninformed Americans, who are opposing the forestry policy of the Federal Government either because of a lack of knowledge of important facts or because of a standpoint of selfish interests, might profitably devote their attention to Circular No. 140, which has recently been issued by the Forestry Service of the United States Department of Agriculture. The title of this pamphlet is "What Forestry Has Done," and it is a careful review of what has been accomplished along this line in the principal countries of the world outside the United States.

While the forestry problem is a new one to this country, it is not so elsewhere, and all the civilized nations of the world, with the exception of Turkey and China, are now devoting much thought and effort to the protection and development of the national forests. And these efforts are the results, not of a theoretical consideration of the benefits of forestry, nor an amateurish fondness for experiments in this line, but they are due rather to an urgent need of increasing and assuring the wood supply, and of preventing the waste and devastation that invariably results from forest waste and mismanagement.

The principles of forestry are the same all over the world, and there is no country that can safely neglect its resources of this class. What is being done in the United States is merely to apply these principles to local needs and local conditions, and there is every reason to believe that this is being most successfully accomplished.

There should be no opposition in Colorado or any other Western State to the work of the Forest Service, which, while it may cause hardship in a few individual cases, and while it may interfere with the selfish interests of a few people, is of inestimable value to the general welfare.

If the present policy is continued—and there is every reason to believe that this will be the case—the time will surely come when Colorado will look upon its great national forests as one of its greatest blessings, not alone for what they are in themselves, but even more in their relations to the agricultural, the manufacturing, and the general business interests of the State.

SUGAR-COATED POISON.

The public-lands convention in Denver was sly enough to yield to public opinion to the extent of declaring in favor of the policy of treating the public lands of the nation as a public trust, to be disposed of in all cases and wherever possible to actual settlers. The necessity of forest reservations was also recognized and reasonable regulations by the Government commended. But the sting in the resolutions is in this paragraph at the close:

"It is finally demanded that, in States wherein forest reserves are situated and not desired, and are excessive, the reservation should be reduced to reasonable limits, whether the land restored contains timber or not."

If the question is left to the timber thieves, they will certainly decide that forest reserves are not desired and always excessive, and that the reasonable limit is not reached until every stick of wood is at the mercy of the "skinners." But the declaration that each State should settle such questions can mean nothing else but a desire to eliminate President Roosevelt from any control in the matter. They know that the interests of bona fide settlers will continue to be safe in his hands, while their own cupidity will encounter unflinching opposition.

The sugar coating of general statements in favor of the rights of the settler will not render any more palatable the specific demand for larger opportunities for the tree robber.

[From the Spokane (Wash.) Spokesman-Review, July 2, 1907.]

IDAHO WANTS SETTLERS.

President Roosevelt and Gifford Pinchot, United States Forester, are right in the forest-reserve policy. It may be conceded that excessive zeal has resulted in occasional errors of judgment. Some of the proclamations creating forest reserves have been too sweeping. Some land has been included within these reserves which would be better left open to agricultural settlement.

But these mistakes of judgment will be corrected, and the policy of the Administration is to extend to the people affected the widest opportunity to be heard, and to investigate with care all alleged mistakes and grievances. An illustration of this fair and liberal policy was recently seen in the action of the Administration in restoring to general settlement a large part of the Priest River Forest Reserve, in Stevens County.

President Roosevelt is right, and the powerful interests which are industriously and noisily trying to destroy the forest reserves are wrong. As President Roosevelt has well said, their only interest is to "skin the land" and move on.

These interests seem to have been represented at the public meeting at Coeur d'Alene City Saturday night. Representative Joseph Fallon, in an attack on the forest-reserve policy, declared, "What we want is not trees, but settlers," a cunning catch cry designed to befog the question and deceive the public. Idaho will get more settlers, and get them over a longer period, with forest reserves than without them.

The purpose of these reserves is to protect some part of the forest wealth of the West against the raids of a few big timber operators, and hold that forest wealth for the use and benefit of the real settler. These great timber interests have acquired gigantic tracts of the best of northern Idaho. How many settlers are upon their lands? Very few, indeed. Almost without exception these lands were taken under the timber act, which requires no settlement, cultivation, or improvement. They were taken largely by people of the towns and cities in a pure spirit of speculation, who later sold out to the big lumber companies.

[From the Fargo (N. Dak.) Call, Wednesday, June 26, 1907.]

LAND GRABBERS.

"Nothing so became the public land convention at Denver," says the Omaha Bee, "as its sine die adjournment after a determined but ineffective effort to create a public sentiment opposed to the President's forestry and public-land preservation policy. The convention adopted a series of resolutions rather platitudinous in character, proclaiming the opposition of the West to any policy that deprives the 'home builder' from access to the public lands by purchase or preemption, and demanding a reduction of the forest reservations made by the President, in order that available agricultural lands shall be left open to the homesteader and the bona fide settler. The resolutions were decidedly mild compared with the anteconvention talk of the aggressive individuals who have made fortunes or want to make fortunes by monopolizing for present-day profit the natural resources of the West which the President insists shall be held as a public heritage and developed for the common good. President Roosevelt's letter to the convention proved unanswerable, and doubtless did much to temper the tone of the resolutions finally adopted. He made it plain that the only purpose of the Government was an enforcement of the laws or the enactment of new ones limiting the amount of Government land which may be acquired by one person, stopping the fraudulent practices by which the land syndicates and the lumber barons have secured control of property which belongs to and should be held for actual home builders; that the Government proposes to maintain for the children of to-day and the future some small supplies of timber, and to so protect the mountains with forest cover that water for irrigation shall not fail, and the rivers—whose use as highways of commerce it is sought to restore—shall always have a sufficient flow; that the settler, the man of small means who has taken up a farm which he intends himself to work and on the proceeds of which he intends to support and bring up his family, shall not be irreparably injured by the demands of the syndicates that have fattened on the public resources at the expense of the home builders. The entire policy of the Administration, both in the matter of public lands and forestry reserves, has been and is to safeguard the rights of the home maker and make settlement and development of the country easier and safer than it is under existing conditions. Even the cattle barons, the land syndicates, and the timber looters, so ably represented in the convention at Denver, have been unable successfully to assail this policy, which has, in fact, been strengthened by the attempt of this convention to overthrow it."

[From the Portland (Oreg.) Oregonian, Friday, June 21, 1907.]

THE PEOPLE AND THE FORESTS.

Control and disposition of the public lands is one of the most important problems now before the American Government, for we have reached a period in our development when control of natural products vitally affects the personal and business interests of all the people. That the public land should be given free to the people has long been one of our most cherished principles. This principle was based upon the theory that free land meant cheap homes, and consequently many home builders. To the extent that free land, or even cheap land, increases the number of home owners who get their living from the land they have thus acquired, the policy of giving away the public domain is a wise one and has never been seriously questioned or attacked. But there are different kinds of public land and different purposes for which ownership is desired. The public-land policy was framed at a time when the great West meant the prairie region east of the Rocky Mountains, where the settler could build his cabin, plow the sod, sow the grain and raise a crop the second season, if not the first, after settlement. The expression "public land" conveyed a mental picture of land that could be tilled or that was suitable for home building. While it was then known in a general way that much of the public domain was timbered or contained deposits of coal, the ultimate value of these natural products was not appreciated. Heavily timbered land was scarcely considered in forming the policy which contemplated the giving away of the public domain to home builders.

In recent years, however, we have come to realize the value of timber and coal lands, and understand that purchasers of either do not seek the land with a view to building homes thereon. We now perceive that the public-land policy, as it applies to tillable land, should be different from the policy that determines the disposition of timber and coal lands. The man who acquires tillable land usually expects to go upon it and make it productive. The man who acquires timber land hopes to sell it to some large corporation. The corporation, founded by men who foresee a scarcity of timber, expects to hold the timber land until it has greatly enhanced in value. The wait may be ten, twenty-five, or fifty years, but the certainty of advancing value makes the purchase a safe speculative investment. Much of the timber land goes into the possession of corporations that do not desire it for milling purposes, but expect to make a profit by reason of the future conditions of supply and demand. Tillable land goes to the people; timber land to the capitalistic few, who expect to levy tribute upon the people who eventually must buy the timber in the form of lumber.

Out of this difference in the character and the purposes for which it is acquired has grown the forest-reserve policy, which contemplates the reservation of lands not suited to home building, but which are either valuable for present growth of timber or may become valuable when trees now young reach maturity. To prevent wanton destruction of timber, young and old, and to retain ownership in the Government, is the end to be accomplished by the forest-reserve policy. At no time has the reserve policy contemplated the withholding of lands suited to settlement or the withholding of timber needed for the manufacture of lumber. The forest-reserve policy therefore includes neither the retarding of settlement nor the hampering of the lumber industry. Incidentally the forest-reserve policy extends to the regulation of grazing on a reservation, the building of roads, cutting of timber, and so forth.

It would be easy to foresee that the forest-reserve idea would meet strong opposition from those persons who wish to acquire timber and those who wish to graze their cattle upon the public domain unrestricted. The capitalist with money to invest can see no good in a forest reserve. The cattle owner who feels confident of getting his share of the range, if left to his own devices entirely, has no word of commendation for a system of regulation which guarantees to a weaker cattleman a just share of the public range. One would expect, too, that a great majority of the people, who have no interest except that possessed by every citizen, would favor the forest-reserve system, for it proposes to retain for them the vast wealth that is theirs.

That there has been strong opposition to the forest-reserve idea is due in part to the abuses which were permitted to grow up in it, chief among them the scripping evil, which enabled large corporations to exchange their worthless lands for good and still retain their good lands within a reserve. In a few instances some lands may have been included in a forest reserve which should have been omitted. This, with some inconvenience in securing grazing permits, may have caused some opposition to the reserves. But, in the main, the fight now being waged in the public lands convention at Denver against the policy of conserving the public lands has its origin in the selfish desires of men who want free timber or free range. The forest system undoubtedly has its faults, but its defects are not serious enough to justify throwing down the lines of the reservations and permitting all who wish to rush upon the last of the timber lands, seizing them in sections and townships to hold until the needs of the people and the concentration of control shall enable the holders to dictate the price of lumber. There are some indications of an effort on the part of the timber interests to control the convention and determine its expressions upon public-land questions. If such a movement has been undertaken and should succeed, the opinions voiced by the convention would have but little weight with the people. On the contrary, it would tend to make them more than ever supporters of the policy which is designed to retain for the people the land that belongs to them.

The argument offered that the creation of a forest reserve withholds land from taxation is a shallow one. If a timber syndicate can afford to buy a township of timber and pay taxes on it for ten years in order to make a profit on the advance in value, can not the people afford to retain that same land and go without the taxes in order to realize the profit on the advance in value? Wherein are the people gainers if they lose the large profit represented by growing value, and gain the small amount of money paid in the form of taxes? And more—wherein have the people profited if they sell the standing timber to a speculator to-day and buy it back from him ten or twenty years hence at many times the price he paid? If a sawmill proprietor needs logs for his mill, let him buy from the people's supply of timber at prices that prevail to-day; but let him not buy the timber in large tracts at present prices to hold until he can exact from the people a much larger price because he controls the supply.

A PETITION.

MACKAY, CUSTER COUNTY, IDAHO, January 19, 1907.

The honorable PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT: The following undersigned citizens and resident freeholders of Custer County, State of Idaho, do petition to have the forest reserve known as the "Sawtooth," to be extended so as to include all of township 3 north, in ranges 22 east and 23 east, and townships 3, 4, 5, and 6, in range 24, except sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15, in township 6, range 24 east, and sections 25, 26, 35, and 36, in township 3, 24 east, Boise meridian, and a strip of agricultural land 1 mile wide, up Antelope Creek, extending to the line between ranges 23 and 24.

And we present the following reasons, to wit, why such extension is very necessary: Township 3, in ranges 22, 23, and 24, also townships 4, 5, and 6, in range 24 east, Boise meridian, and watersheds of Alder, branches of Antelope, White Knob, and Sheep creeks, also some very valuable timber and grazing lands which are by the present boundaries of this reserve left out.

We guarantee that if such extension is granted that permits for grazing will be applied for for sufficient stock to stock the extension completely.

Notice on the Forestry Reserve map that timber and watersheds petitioned are not on the reserve.

In view of the foregoing facts we respectfully submit this petition.

REPORT AND PETITION OF SETTLERS OF EAST FORK OF SALMON RIVER.

We, the people of East Fork of Salmon River, have this 14th day of March, A. D. 1907, assembled for the purpose of sending to the President of the United States and Bureau of Forestry the following facts:

1. That we are actual citizens of the United States and State of Idaho.

2. That we are all actual landowners and residents in this valley, and have been for a period of from three to twenty years.

3. That we, who have recently settled here, have bought out ranches that have been improved, and herds that have been ranged for the past twenty years.

4. That we annually cut from our ranches various amounts of hay, ranging from 25 to 150 tons.

5. That we have no accessible market for our hay product, except by feeding.

6. That we under the present conditions will use the reserve ranges for three or four months and our ranches for three or four months, and depend upon range lying between our ranches and reserve lines for the balance of the year.

7. That we anticipate that large numbers of cattle, horses, and sheep will be put upon these ranges lying between our ranches and reserve lines, and thereby overstocking them, and rendering them utterly useless to the bonafide residents and property owners, which will render it necessary for us to dispose of our herds and go out of the business.

8. That we hereby petition the President of the United States and the Bureau of Forestry to extend the present lines of the Sawtooth extensions of the Sawtooth Reserve to include the drainage of that part of the East Fork of Salmon River and Antelope Valley, down to the survey line, which is not already in the reserve, in order that we may secure the protection of its laws.

9. That we feel that if we can not receive the desired extension, the reserve, as now created, will work numerous hardships upon the bona fide settlers.

10. And we pledge ourselves, if said petition is granted, to observe the rules and regulations governing said reserve and to support any reasonable policy for the protection of the timber and the range.

11. And we do individually and collectively affirm that the foregoing statements are true, and we do respectively beseech the President to speedily grant our petition, that we may at once come under the administration of the Sawtooth Forest Reserve.

THE HAILEY COMMERCIAL CLUB,
Hailey, Idaho, March 8, 1906.

At a general regular meeting of the Hailey Commercial Club, held March 5, the following "Extract from Report on Water Supply of Cities Near the Sawtooth Forest Reserve" was presented and read:

"Ketchum, Hailey, and Bellevue are dependent upon Wood River and its tributaries for their water supply, but that watershed is not within a forest reserve. These three towns are very greatly in need of adequate protection of the watershed upon which they must rely. At present the basin of Wood River is given up to sheep grazing almost entirely and the denudation of the range is nearly complete. The soil conditions are such that persistent grazing kills out the grass and herbage quickly and transforms the surface into a dust heap. All three towns are favorite shipping points for sheep, and hundreds of thousands of sheep are herded in the vicinity every year about shipping time. Flocks of ewes are taken there from the hill ranges for the shipment of lambs, and herded there during the time of shipment, and then returned to the higher lands, near the sources of the tributary creeks, for further pasture. These practices make the region around the three towns a steadily used trail rather than an ordinary range, and the injury to the watershed is correspondingly great. The timber supply in the mountains drained by the Wood River has been greatly depleted to supply the mines in that region, and since the timber was cut off the presence of sheep has prevented reforestation. I know of no other section of Idaho where the needs of the people call more loudly for the protection afforded by forest reserves than this Wood River country, nor is there a better field in which to demonstrate the benefits of forest planting. If that watershed could be included in a reserve and forest planting pushed there, the benefits would be incalculable."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are a number of things that I desired to say, but the time is so far spent that I believe it would be proper for me to content myself with what has already been said. I wish, however, to express the hope that this discussion will lead at least to a better understanding in the future between complainants and officers of the Forest Service.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate long, nor do I mean to enter into any detailed discussion of the particular points in this bill, or as to the different phases of the Forestry Service, which have already been so fully and ably discussed.

I think that the so-called great outrage of lump-sum appropriations has been pretty well disposed of. That is a common form of making appropriations in every bureau of the Department of Agriculture as well as in many other Departments. The Bureau of Animal Industry expends about $2,400,000 in lump sums, and I think there is no need of our getting excited over this particular bureau.

Nor do I care to argue, Mr. President, the point of what may be called forest economics; that is, the wisdom of so managing forests that they shall return revenue from timber cut and from land used for grazing or other purposes. Nor do I think, Mr. President, that the Forestry Service or the Chief Forester need any defense. Mr. Pinchot's service, to my mind, has been of the most admirable character. There is one thing certain about it. No more disinterested service has ever been rendered to a government.

All that I desire to say here is in regard to the general policy. I am sorry, Mr. President, to be obliged to use the word "policy," which my friend, the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], commented on with such severity the other day; but the fact is that no other word occurs to me to express the meaning which I wish to convey. I think it is legitimate to speak of an agreed method or plan of dealing with any governmental interest as a policy, and I wish to defend the policy in regard to the Forest Service on somewhat broader grounds than the details which we have necessarily been obliged to discuss.

In the first place, Mr. President, while I agree with the Senator from Idaho that the forests should be administered in the interest of the people, I think perhaps we differ as to our definition of the word "people." I do not confine it to the people of Idaho or to a portion of the people of Idaho. I think the people interested in the preservation of those forests are the people who created the Government of the United States—the entire people of the United States. The land now occupied by the great States of the Northwest was land acquired by the United States, by the older States, by purchase, by conquest, or by discovery, and that land was the property of the United States. When States were carved out of that land the United States had an entire right to reserve certain portions of it for such uses as they saw fit to apply them to, and therefore this public domain belongs to all the people of the country, and they have a right to deal with it as seems to them best.

It is a great mistake, Mr. President, to suppose that we of the older States have any feeling but one of pride and interest in the people who built up the great States of the Far West in the new country. We realize that our future and our prosperity is bound up in theirs, and we can wish for nothing but what is for their interest. But we do not want to have the interests of the whole country and the larger interests of the great future sacrificed to an immediate purpose of money making.

Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho referred to the pioneers, to the old settlers of New England and the Middle States. It is out of the experience of New England that I seek to defend this policy. Of course for many years the people were so comparatively small in number that, with the old-fashioned appliances, the destruction which they effected in the forests was but slight, but, with the enormous growth of population, the immense development of machinery, and the vast improvement in transportation, the methods of destruction have been so accelerated that it is a commonplace and a truism to say that our forests are disappearing.

In New England from the beginning down almost to the present day we followed the theory that nobody must be interfered with in the use or waste of the natural resources of the country. What has been called in this debate "a God-given right to destroy or use up any natural resources without interference" was pretty fully exercised; and to-day, at immense expense, we are trying to restore and preserve our forests. We are trying to protect our game and our song birds; we are trying to replace the fish, which have been in many places driven almost out of existence and brought inshore fisheries to an end. The reckless waste and abuse of our natural resources has been one of the great misfortunes of the older parts of the country.

The State of Maine was the first State, in New England certainly, and, I think, one of the first States in the Union, to adopt more intelligent laws as to the regulation of our forests and equally intelligent laws for the protection of game. The result of those wise laws which have been adopted in Maine is that game is reappearing and is a source of revenue to the State. Game is furnished for the market, instead of the people going on in a reckless extirpation of those valuable birds and animals.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts as to which conduces more to prosperity and the welfare of a country—a wild deer or an Alderney cow—the wild deer in the forest and the Alderney cow on the farm?

Mr. LODGE. I will come to that, Mr. President, as the Senator suggests it. He told us a great deal about the home. He said that what we wanted were homes; what we wanted were houses. To have houses and homes in treeless wastes, where no song bird is ever heard, where the game has been extirpated, the fish destroyed, and all the natural resources have been abandoned and abused, is not civilization; it is retrogression. It is the act of the improvident Indian, or the savage, to destroy these great gifts, because we can make immediate profit out of them, instead of husbanding them for the use of those who are to come after us.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I were to suggest that the best game preservers that this country ever knew were the Indians, and that when the Indian had been living alone on this continent for more centuries than we are able to reckon the game was at the high tide, and that all we have done that we call "civilization" is to substitute the domestic animal for the wild game?

Mr. LODGE. If I did not do the Indian justice in comparing him with the white man who destroys the game, I beg the Indian's pardon. I thought the Indian was reckless; but it does not alter in the least my opinion of the white men who have destroyed the game. They went so far—I am not criticising other States, but I am speaking of my own home—that the very existence of the song bird, one of the joys of life, was endangered in my State and in many others. We have had to enact national legislation to protect them. I have been in parts of Europe where any bird is regarded as game, and where you scarcely ever hear the song of a bird.

In the same way we have recklessly abused the fisheries. The migatory fish have been driven away in my time from the rivers of our coast, and because of the modern appliances—nets, steam trawlers, and things like that—and the utterly reckless way in which the fish are killed at the wrong season, that great food supply is being diminished all along our coasts. We are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars to try and keep up the fish and game supply.

Mr. President, I think the policy applies equally to all. It is not merely that the forests are valuable for lumber and for furnishing timber that we greatly need them. It is that they are also very important to our water supply, very important to our streams. It is the existence of the forests that prevents our streams from oscillating between floods and torrents and dry river beds, with just a little thread of water trickling through them. I do not want to see the mistakes of the past repeated. I want to see the wisdom that we learned too late, or, at all events, if not too late, which we are compelled now to put into practice at great expense, to be made good use of in the newer portions of the country on the public domain.

We have lingered far behind other nations of the world in many directions, where intelligence and an advanced civilization make their mark, and in none more than in the protection of our forests. The reason is in all these things, not that we are not alert and progressive, for there is no more intelligent, alert, and progressive people in the world than the American people, but we have lingered behind in these directions because these movements of different kinds have been always accompanied by the resistance of those who wish to make immediate profit, who wish to make money out of it. That has stopped many of the needed reforms or the needed policies for the protection of our natural resources.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that I think he unwarrantably assumes that the people of the West are opposing forest reserves or the reservation and preservation of the forests. I have heard no one contend that there should be no forest reserves. I have misunderstood everybody if that is what they have been contending for. My understanding is that the objection is to the character of the administration they are receiving in many details, but particularly the inclusion in the reserves of vast quantities of lands that are suitable for homes, suitable for farms, and are not forest lands proper. That, at least, is my position.

If the Senator will allow me, I will make another statement. While I believe that it is proper enough, in the interest of the whole people, as the Senator contends, to reserve and preserve the forest lands proper in the Western States, I do think that some just measure should be provided to compensate those States for the loss they necessarily sustain by this great body of land being withdrawn from private entry and becoming private, tax-paying, and revenue-producing property. I am going to offer, before the consideration of this bill is concluded, an amendment providing that the States be given 25 per cent of the proceeds of these reserves. That will go a long way toward compensating them for the loss they are suffering. The Senator knows that if one-fourth of his State were withdrawn altogether from private use it would be a very great and serious loss to that State.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts, I want to ask the Senator from Oregon a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator from Oregon understand that there can not be homestead entries made in the forest reserves?

Mr. FULTON. The Senator from Oregon understands exactly what the law is.

Mr. WARREN. I want to get his opinion of the law.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator from Oregon understands that under the law agricultural land is not properly to be included in forest reserves, and he knows that it is, or understands that it is, subject to entry in the reserves.

Mr. WARREN. After having been included?

Mr. FULTON. Yes; after having been included; but he knows that such restrictions and obstacles are put in the way of such settlement that the privilege is a practical nullity.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. FLINT. I should like to ask the Senator whether he does not know, as a matter of fact, that thousands of homestead entries have been made in the forest reserves every year since the act was enacted?

Mr. FULTON. I know there are a great many. I do not undertake to say that there are thousands, or what numerals indicate the number; but I do know, and I think every representative from the Northwestern States knows, that there are continual complaints being brought and, on investigation, they are found to be just. Men are seeking to take up lands that are suitable for agriculture, and yet such obstructions are thrown around them that they can not do it. But that is not all. I know I am intruding on the time of the Senator from Massachusetts, but a question was asked and I am trying to answer it.

It is one thing to say that a man may go into a forest reserve and enter a tract of land for a farm. It is another thing to say that it is really any great privilege to him that he may enter a tract of land there and then no other person be allowed an entry in that vicinity. The result is he lives there isolated from schools and churches, from all the benefits and privileges of civilized life. There can be no community there. There is no way of making county roads. There is no way of getting the advantages of community life. Therefore this great privilege which Senators talk about of being allowed to enter lands in a forest reserve after all is giving to him mere husks.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not suppose these lands could be precisely described as withdrawn from taxation, because they never were subject to taxation by the State except so far as they were taken up. It was withdrawing them from the possibility in many cases of turning them into taxable property.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say that under recent legislation, while the Government may create a forest reservation, the Secretary of Agriculture, through the Forester, is allowed, after a reservation has been created, to examine the lands, and if any of the lands are better fitted for agricultural purposes than for forestry, he can so declare them. Then they are open to homestead entry. That is the law now.

Mr. LODGE. I am much obliged to the Senator for stating the law just as it is.

I think, Mr. President, that the energetic and determined movement against the forests and against control of them comes largely, as is characteristic of human nature, from those who expect to make money out of them. I think those people are shortsighted, and that the policy of the Government should be to take a longer look ahead.

Mr. President, there may have been mistakes in the administration of some of the details. But I am very confident that the general policy in all its branches is sound and correct. There may have been mistakes in administration. It would have been amazing if in such a great body of employees as that under the Forestry Division there should not be some incompetent and some injudicious person. They are not paid very well, and no doubt some of them may not have the best of manners. The jack-in-office is not confined to the Forestry Service. The man who "drest in a little brief authority"—and the smaller the man the more he feels the authority—is rude to his fellow-citizens, and the people who come to him on business is not confined to Idaho. I have met some of them much nearer where we are standing than is the State of Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. If it would not divert the Senator from Massachusetts from the line laid down by him in this matter, I should be glad to have his opinion on one point, recognizing as I do his ability as a lawyer and his extensive learning on economic questions. I should like to have his opinion as to the right and the propriety of including within a forest reserve the State school lands, which it is provided shall be sold at a minimum price of $10 per acre, and placing them out of the control of the State and under the control of the forestry officers.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to hear the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts on that point.

Mr. LODGE. That subject has been very thoroughly discussed here to-day, and it seems to me it is entirely reasonable, as I understand the case to be. There are a number of unsurveyed school sections in the forest reserves.

Mr. HEYBURN. And many surveyed.

Mr. LODGE. Some, I suppose, have been surveyed. A proportionate payment is made to the State, as was shown here by the figures given by the Senator from Utah, of all the revenues derived from these lands; and if they are necessary for the preservation of the forest reserves, I can not see why that is not a perfectly legitimate and fair arrangement.

Mr. HEYBURN. But the question I desired to submit to the Senator from Massachusetts was as to the right of the Government to sequester those lands.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. The question of the Senator from Idaho assumes as a fact what is not a fact. The Government of the United States does not assume control of the school sections or deprive the State of them. The United States simply includes a body of land in a reservation, and it happens that the school sections are within the reservation, but the Government of the United States does not interfere with the State at all in the disposal of that land or the timber that is on it.

Mr. LODGE. That is the situation as I understand it.

Mr. HEYBURN. The trouble is, that is not the fact. That might form the basis of an argument, but I will take the instance of the Bitter Root Forest Reserve, which is one of the largest. It includes the school sections 16 and 36. That is under the control of the Forestry Service, and if the State were to attempt to sell those lands, it could not deliver the goods and place the purchasers in possession, because they are under the control of the Forestry Service. That is the fact. There are nearly 800,000 acres of those school lands in the forest reserves in Idaho.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LODGE. I shall take only a moment more, and then I shall be glad to yield the floor to the Senator from Nevada, unless he merely desires to ask a question, in which event I will yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho a question.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator wishes to ask somebody else a question I should prefer to conclude.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no doubt I could get answers from many sources, but I have great confidence in the legal judgment of the Senator from Massachusetts, and I was submitting to him the question of the right of the Forestry Service or the Government of the United States to take those lands to any extent for any purpose.

Mr. LODGE. I am flattered by the kind opinion which the Senator from Idaho expresses of my legal abilities. I am afraid he will not think quite so well of them when I say that it seems to me it is a perfectly lawful thing to do. But I will not undertake to argue that question. Better lawyers than I will discuss it. I merely wish to finish what I was saying.

I think there has been a tendency to try to divert this debate onto the question of the employees of the Forestry Service. I was about to say when I was interrupted that it is not necessary to go to Idaho to find subordinate officers who do not have good manners. I know that I have seen in the subordinate officers of a court, which I will not name, the most offensive manners displayed to everybody without distinction, but I should be sorry on that account to argue that the judicial system of the United States should be abolished or that it should be crippled or its appropriations cut down. We are dealing with a great policy, and I think these mistakes of some of the employees, these instances of bad manners or bad conduct are trifling when we are deciding a question which is of the utmost moment to the people of the United States not only now, but in the future. If there have been errors in administration, let them be brought to the attention of the proper authorities and they will undoubtedly be corrected.

Mr. President, what I care about is the maintenance of what I think is a great and useful policy, which will be of benefit to all the people of the United States, a policy which is not for to-day, but which is for our children and our children's children.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, with nearly every word that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has uttered I am in thorough accord, and while it is not my intention to go into the details of the Forestry Service further than some computations in the bill itself, I want to enter here and now my solemn protest as to the ground upon which this debate has proceeded for two or three days, particularly the ground on which it has proceeded most of the afternoon, and that is that everyone who opposes this specific appropriation in the pending bill is opposed to the general principles of forestry.

The Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], in his eloquent address of two or three days ago, pictured the beauties of the forests. With all due deference to the Senator from New York, he can not half appreciate them. The man who has lived all his life among the trees, in the fields, in the city, in the parks, can not fully appreciate the forests.

Leave it to the man who has lived his life on the arid lands. Can a man living in the city of Washington, with all of the beauties surrounding it, appreciate the forests as can a man living in my town, where for 30 miles from it there is not a tree the size of a man's body? It ill suits me to find this discussion carried on with the idea that those who are opposed to some administrative features of the forest policy are actuated by any selfish motive or have any desire except for a good, energetic, fruitful forest policy for this nation.

It has been intimated by nearly everyone who has spoken that the only men who are opposed to the present system and the present policy are those who have some personal interest to serve. The Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], when he was inquired of as to what interests are opposing the present condition of affairs, cited the sheep interests. The sheep interests are opposed not to what is, but to what they fear; not so much to what is the present policy of administering the forest reserves as to what they fear from the declared purposes of the Forester of the United States. They are not complaining especially of the 5-cent fee charged for ranging upon the public forests, but they are fearful that the policy of permits on the public lands will be extended not only to the forests, but to every acre of unoccupied land in all our arid region. That is the seat and foundation of the opposition on the part of the sheep interest.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. With pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. I desire to ask the Senator if the opposition of the sheep men is not a selfish interest, then?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is a selfish interest as the interest of every man in every business is a selfish interest. However, the point I make is that they are not complaining so much because of the present forest reserves, but that the proposed immense expansion of this great service will operate to control every unoccupied acre of the public domain; and that is the declared policy now, as it was the policy a year ago. The fact that the Senate of the United States said a year ago that this policy should not reach out over the arid lands has not stopped for one moment the propaganda that the time must come when all the unoccupied public lands of the United States shall be taken under the control of the Bureau of Forestry in the Department of Agriculture.

No, Mr. President, we are not opposed to a legitimate, honest, energetic forest policy. It is not my purpose, and it never has been, to attack any person, either the present Forester or any of the officials of his Department. But I shall not be moved from my views because of the esteem in which I hold that gentleman, nor because of the esteem in which others hold him. Neither am I moved by the prophecies that I see depicted on the map upon the wall. Prophecies often fail.

I am not concerned so much as are some of the Senators who have spoken to this question as to exhausting our national resources. Rather am I inclined to agree with the eloquent Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] when he said that when the timber is gone better material will be here.

There are some things to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate, and I will speak now, not of the administration of the Forestry Service, but to the recklessness, the almost criminal recklessness, with which the Senate of the United States is voting public moneys to unknown purposes. I defy any man upon the floor of the Senate to take the reports which have been furnished by the Forestry Bureau and state how much has been earned and how much will be spent next year, and what for. It has been asserted here by nearly everyone who has taken part in the debate—I notice that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is an exception—that the forest reserves of this nation are self-supporting, and that the amount received from timber sales, for grazing privileges, and for special privileges, and turned into the Treasury of the United States is sufficient to pay for the administration of this service. We might as well meet that at once.

It does not come within a million and a half dollars a year of it. One million and a half dollars a year more than is received from all the timber that is sold, from all the permits granted, from all the grazing that is charged for, we are asked to contribute toward the management of forest reserves.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. With great pleasure.

Mr. FLINT. Does the Senator include in that the further item of permanent improvements and also the reforestation of various forest reserves?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am including everything that the Forestry Service takes in and the expenditures of the Forest Service to the debit of its account.

Mr. FLINT. Part of it is for permanent improvements.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I presume, likely, a small part of it. No very great permanent improvements in the forest reserves of the United States have yet been made.

As I said, we are asked to appropriate a million and a half dollars in excess of the revenues of the forests; and if our friends, the professional foresters, outside of official life, have their way, we will soon be obliged to appropriate every dollar necessary for the management of the forest reserves, and not one dollar from the revenues of those reserves will be put into the management, protection, development, or care of those reserves.

I want to call attention, Mr. President, in that connection to a bill which is now pending in Congress providing for the purchase of land in the Appalachian Forest Reserve; and this bill is advocated and special appeals have been sent out, not by the Bureau of Forestry, but by its organ, the journal of the American Forestry Association. I have it here. An appeal has been sent out by the American Forestry Association that this bill shall be supported; that it would not cost much after all to buy the Appalachian forests because the bill to which our attention is called and for which we are urged to vote provides that from 1910 to 1918 or 1919 all the proceeds of all the forests of the United States shall be used in the purchase of the Appalachian reserve.

I ask Senators of the United States to consider what sort of an appropriation we shall have to go up against in a few years if we proceed at this rate. Five million dollars wanted by the Forester this year, according to the statement before the House committee—$5,000,000 per annum. I see some members of the Appropriations Committee here. The very bill before us provides for the forest reserves of this nation, a service which has been going on for only four or five years, and it shows how rapidly has been the advance, that more than one-third of all the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, embracing within its scope the great Mississippi Valley and every farm in the United States, is for the Forestry Service, which is still in its very infancy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. I want to suggest to the Senator from Wyoming that if it were not for these forest reserves there would not be any farms in a good deal of this territory for which to make any appropriation.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The forest reserves have been established for only five years. The farms have been there for fifty and a hundred years.

Mr. FLINT. As an instance, I call the attention of the Senator to my own State. If the forests had been allowed to be cut as they had been for five years prior to the creation of the reserves, one of the most fertile parts of my State would to-day be a desert.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator can get into no argument with me in relation to that. I believe, as I said, as well as he does in the creation of forest reserves. I believe in having them created where they are needed in exactly such places as the Senator has referred to. I do not believe in having them created indiscriminately because upon the map there is a mountain range or a stream heading up. I do not believe in creating forest reserves from maps and plats.

I have some well-defined notions in regard to what I think are wrongs connected with the forest reserves. I further believe it is wrong for the Forestry Service to seek by indirection to do what it can not do directly. I do not believe that is honest dealing with the American people.

A year and a half ago it was insisted by the Forestry Service and the Agricultural Department that they had the right to control the waters within the various States if they were within a forest reserve. A year ago that was insisted upon. It was insisted upon on the floor of the House and on the floor of the Senate, and it was said in support of that claim that because they had the right to control and sell this water it could be capitalized in such a way as to produce hundreds of thousands of dollars to the Forest Service. I think the Senator from California has a distinct recollection of that. But since that time the Forestry Service have awakened to a due appreciation of the law, and no longer does that Bureau or the Agricultural Department claim that it has the right to the waters in a State. I am glad to see that in this bill there is provided an appropriation of $500 for the purchase of law books for the Forestry Service. I hope those people will read them. They will have less difficulty if they do.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. So that I may not be placed in a false position in regard to the charge for water to which the Senator refers, I desire to say it was my understanding last session—and it is my understanding this session—that the proposed charge is not for the water within the reservation on account of any claim of ownership by the Government, but simply a charge for conserving the water and for the use of the public lands for a right of way.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is the claim which is now made for the first time since the Forestry Service has been stretched over the Rocky Mountain country. Last year it was specifically claimed that they had the distinct right to the water and to control the water within the State. This year it is not so claimed.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator if the present claim is not manifestly a mere subterfuge whereby to get in a charge for the use of the water?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I said in starting that I censured that Bureau now for seeking to get by indirection what it could not get directly under the law.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to ask the Senator in what bill it is that there is a provision that one-third of the proceeds of the forest reserves shall be applied to the purchase of the proposed Appalachian Mountain Reserve.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Not one-third, but all of the proceeds.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What bill is it? Is it the Senate bill reported by the committee?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is not the Senate bill reported by the committee. The American Forestry Association does not seem to care for that bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to his colleague?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. While my colleague has a break in his remarks I may say that he incorrectly, though not intentionally, stated the proportion of the appropriations for the Agricultural Department which went to forestry. I take it he has forgotten that, while this bill represents all that is expended by the Forestry Division, it does not represent all that is expended by the Agricultural Department. There are $3,000,000 in addition to this for meat inspection, and a million or more for agricultural colleges, etc.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. That changes the proportion.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I realize that, but they are special appropriations for special purposes, and hence are not included in the agricultural appropriation bill. I was speaking, of course, of the agricultural appropriation bill, which carried, all told, $11,642,146, while the Forestry Service carried $3,796,200.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly. I will postpone my reply to the Senator from Connecticut until afterwards.

Mr. SMOOT. In this connection I think the Senator from Wyoming will admit that as far as the total expense is concerned, the investigations and everything else connected with the Forest Service, there is besides that a receipt coming to the Treasury of the United States from the proceeds of these forests that nearly offsets the amount appropriated.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It offsets it within half, but that, of course, the Senator from Wyoming understands. The Senator from Wyoming understands that there are charges made upon the forest reserves.

The Senator from Wyoming further understands that those charges when collected go into the Treasury of the United States and are there the same as other moneys in the Treasury, and that when the Congress of the United States votes $4,000,000 for the Forest Service it votes it from the Treasury of the United States, and it does not make any difference how it got in there any more than it makes any difference how the money that we vote for the postal service got in there. It makes no difference whatever.

But to return to the question of the Senator from Connecticut: I received in due course of mail a day or two ago what appears to be a business sheet or a press bulletin from the American Forestry Association. This is in answer to the question of the Senator from Connecticut. It calls attention to three bills now before Congress—first the Pollard bill, and second the Weeks bill, and then the Lever bill. It goes on then to give the individual names of the members of the Committee on Agriculture in the House. It says:

Of these, Messrs. COCKS of New York, HASKINS, LAMB, LEVER, LORIMER, and WEEKS, are counted as certainly for the measure—

Getting them all sized up—

Messrs. GILHAMS, McLAUGHLIN of Michigan, and STANLEY are also believed to be favorable—

Now, talk about your lobbying—

All possible pressure should at once be brought to bear upon the doubtful members of this committee to the end that they may promptly and favorably report the Weeks or Lever bill.

I sent for one of them, which is House bill 21357.

Mr. WARREN. If I do not disturb my colleague, perhaps I did not catch his idea. What association sends out that circular?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The American Forestry Association.

Mr. WARREN. Of course the Senator does not claim that the American Forestry Association is the United States Forestry Service?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I hope my colleague will give me credit for enough intelligence to know that that is true.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to have that stated.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But, of course, my colleague will not deny the fact that the publications of the American Forestry Association are largely the product of the Forestry Bureau of this Department.

Mr. WARREN. To show my ignorance, I do not know the first thing about it, and if my colleague knows it I should be glad to have him state it. My idea is that the American Forestry Association is just like a great many other associations, made up of a class of enthusiastic people that do not have a great deal to do but to assume to take care of public affairs and the Congress of the United States. There may be those in the Forestry Service who are associated with them, but we are constantly surrounded with circulars and letters and propositions from volunteer associations that surely are not chargeable to any one of the Departments of the Government as such.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think if my colleague will take the publications of the American Forestry Association and notice the exceeding good humor with which they support every proposition of the Forestry Bureau, and the exceeding ill-humor with which they treat every person and every utterance that is opposed in any way to the administration of the Forestry Bureau, he will come to the conclusion that at least they are living in the same town, if not under the same roof.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask further if that is the same association that asks that there shall be stables built and hay provided for the live stock on the plains of the West?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No.

Mr. WARREN. That is still another association.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is a kindred association—a society for the prevention of cruelty to animals.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator from Wyoming will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; I am glad to yield, but I should like to finish answering the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was going to give a statement as to the officers of the American Forestry Association. I have here a publication which I received from them.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I shall be very glad to hear it.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Chief of the Agricultural Department of the United States is the president of the American Forestry Association, the Hon. James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture. The vice-presidents of the American Forestry Association are Dr. Edward Everett Hale, Mr. F. E. Weyerhaeuser, Mr. James W. Pinchot, Dr. B. E. Fernow, and Mr. John L. Kaul.

I have the offices noted here, so that if there is any question as to the identity of the American Forestry Association with the administrative department of the Government, to whose action the Senator is addressing himself, that can be readily settled.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not think there is any question at all, and I think both parties are proud of the union. But I want to read the bill for the information of the Senator from Connecticut. The provision to which I refer is as follows:

That to carry out the provisions of this act the sum of $1,500,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and said sum shall be available immediately and until expended; and there is hereby appropriated, to be available on July 1, 1909, and on July 1 of each year thereafter, until 1918, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to the moneys received from the sale of any products or use of any lands or resources of all national forests for the previous fiscal year, said sums to be available until expended to further carry out the provisions of this act.

Now, that is one of the things that the Congress of the United States and the Appropriations Committee are soon going to be up against.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator state the number of the House bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is No. 21357.

Now, Mr. President, a good deal has been said in defense of lump-sum appropriations. I do not object to them particularly. I think, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, very many lump-sum appropriations are bad; but neither the Senator from Massachusetts nor any other Senator on this floor, whether he is a member of the Appropriations Committee or not, can point to an appropriation that is the same or of like character as this.

The lump-sum appropriation to which the Senator called attention was an appropriation of something like $3,051,000. There is an estimate in the Book of Estimates of the appropriation for salaries outside of Washington of $144,300. That is the specific appropriation for statutory salaries. Then there is a lump-sum appropriation for all other salaries, for all the expenditures of the reserves, for all the administration of the reserves, a lump sum of $3,051,900.

I am not an expert on appropriations. It occurs to me, however, that the safest way would be to be a little more specific in that respect. I think the members of the Committee on Appropriations will agree with me. We have gotten into a habit of appropriating money in that way, but there follows another appropriation that we have not as yet gotten in the habit of making, and I hope we will not get into it now.

It is this: After the estimates have been furnished from the Department of Agriculture, after every conceivable thing has been covered by this blanket or lump appropriation, after provision has been made for every sort of thing possible—for the planting of trees, erecting buildings—and "to pay all expenses necessary to protect, administer, and improve the national forests."

If there is a thing that can be done in an administrative capacity with reference to any of those forests, I believe it is included in this first lump-sum appropriation "to pay all expenses necessary to protect, administer, and improve the national forests."

But my mind is somewhat sluggish. It does not work at all at times. I have been trying to think since I read this appropriation bill of one thing that is necessary to be done that can not be done under that appropriation which was first asked for.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, would the Senator rather that I should offer a brief explanation of that as I understand it now, or wait until he finishes?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator may suit his own pleasure. It would not interrupt me at all.

Mr. WARREN. The appropriation bills, as the Senator knows, are made up on the House side. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture over there, I believe, has no assignments upon other committees—no committee duties excepting those of his Agricultural Committee.

The members of that committee do not have five or six committees apiece to serve on, as do Senators. They give a great deal of attention to these matters. They also have on the House side a special committee whose duty it is to investigate the Agricultural Department.

Now, these matters come to the Agricultural Committee of the House first. They take up and construct the bill from the estimates.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on this side, as Senators know, has had a rather peculiar experience during this session, having been conducted in the usual way under the late able, experienced, and venerable Senator from Vermont, Mr. Proctor, who was chairman of the committee until quite late in the session. He passed over.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] assumed his place as chairman. At the time he accepted it he was in a hospital at St. Paul; he has since been in a hospital in Washington; and, because of his continued and severe illness, he has been on the floor of the Senate, I think, but once, and then only for a few moments. The old clerks of that committee have gone out and a new force has come in—a most excellent chief clerk and assistant. Naturally one might think this committee had been sluggish or neglectful. However, such, I claim, is not the case.

The committee on the other side evidently, in constructing the bill, took and patterned it after the bill of last year, which was in terms almost precisely like the one before us which my colleague now alludes to. That is to say, there was a lump sum in one place for a large amount and a lump sum in another for a half million dollars. That, I take it, was not the fault of, but it was nevertheless done by the Senate last year, if I remember aright. So when it—last year's—left the Senate, the Senate had reconstructed the bill and it was like this new one.

Now, the House followed that. We are not permitted to criticise the House, and I have no desire to criticise it. When the bill came over on this side the acting chairman of the committee—and I suppose others of the committee—looked very carefully back through all matters and papers and debates. There is no paper lacking; there are no figures lacking to show precisely what all this money is to be expended for, and it is all very easily explained, but the committee was not prepared to take the bill to pieces and reconstruct it in the last hours of the session of Congress and divide it up.

Furthermore, as the Senator knows, ever since he has been in the Senate the agricultural appropriation bill has been one continuation of lump sums for every bureau. So there has been no reason to expect that there might be any special opposition to these lump sums. But as to what is to be done with the money appropriated here, as the Senator probably knows, there is a list of items for every dollar that is appropriated, and even more is called for.

I will agree with the Senator that lump sums are not the best way to appropriate money, and we are gradually wiping them out in the various bills and putting in detailed appropriations. The Senator knows that. We are making progress; but there is no reason, in my judgment, why now there should be any criticism called to this particular matter other than the general criticism that the bill has been carried along in lump sums heretofore.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I hope my colleague did not misunderstand me. I said explicitly I did not particularly object to this lump-fund appropriation of $3,000,000, and I know the difficulties under which the Committee on Agriculture has labored. I know that my colleague is acting chairman of that committee, and as chairman of the Military Affairs Committee and a member of the Committee on Appropriations, he has all his time occupied and more than occupied. I am certainly making no criticism of the committee. I am simply asking the Senate of the United States not to embark on a new way of appropriating money.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I understood perfectly that the Senator was not criticising that, but I want to enter a disclaimer now, and assert that the Senate is not entering in this bill upon new territory so far as appropriations in lump sums are concerned, but is following precisely what has been done before.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think I shall demonstrate that the Senator is entirely mistaken. Never until last year was the sum of $500,000 given on this bill, to be expended without let or hindrance by the head of the Department.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, never until last year was there any appropriation of considerable size, because they formerly used the income from the forests.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator knows very well that the reason why we gave the $500,000 last year, which is now cited as a precedent, was because they said they had to have it as they were going to be deprived of the revenue out of the forest reserves.

Now, what I object to is this. After asking for this appropriation of $500,000 last year, to be used without let or hindrance because of some supposed injury by reason of our legislation of last year, I object to using that as a precedent why we should continue this sort of an appropriation.

Mr. President, I will try to go on with the thought I had in my mind when I was interrupted. I said, and say now, there is nothing necessary to the administration under the care and the protection of any of the forest reserves that is not included in the wording of the first great lump appropriation of over $3,000,000. Then we come to this remarkable paragraph in the bill:

> And there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000, to be expended as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct for the proper and economical administration, protection, and development of the National Forests.

Mr. President, I submit that if that is to be used in the care and development and the protection of the national forests, it should have been included in the general lump sum, and it should not have been as a separate item branching out on a new way of appropriating money.

It is said that that is necessary to be used for permanent improvements. That $500,000 was first foreshadowed in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator wish to add the $500,000 to the other and make it one sum?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not wish to do anything of that sort.

Mr. WARREN. The committee will not object to assembling the two amounts, if the Senator wishes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not believe that it is necessary to appropriate it at all.

Mr. WARREN. Then the fault the Senator makes is not as to its being in two amounts, but he thinks the total is too much.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; the fault I find is that after the Secretary of Agriculture has made his estimates, stating everything that he wants for the Department of Agriculture and the Forestry Service, he should have not one, but two afterthoughts, one of $500,000 and one of $100,000, both of which thoughts must have been in his mind and in his knowledge at the time he made the original estimates.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is wrong, as far as my knowledge goes about an afterthought of $500,000. The amount he asked for is $2,000,000, and twenty-six pages of the hearings give all the items for which he wanted it, in case the $500,000 or more was appropriated.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am speaking of the Book of Estimates which is furnished through the Treasury Department, and which is what the ordinary lay Congressman and Senator has to take. I was about to say that it came as an afterthought, and the afterthought was foreshadowed when the estimate was sent in. I want to read from the Book of Estimates as throwing some light upon this proposition. "Administration, etc., of the National Forests"—appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908—"$500,000." The total appropriation to be appropriated under the head of appropriations therein, is given. Then, there is this note:

> NOTE.—The appropriation of $500,000 for the administration, protection, and development of the National Forests, together with its several provisos, have been omitted, as the provisos are continuing legislation, and as a separate estimate will be submitted for such money as may be necessary for the administration, protection, and development of the National Forests.

That is what was submitted afterwards in the hearing of the House committee.

But there is another matter in connection with this appropriation which shows how carelessly we are acting. I am not attacking the Forest Service in what I say of this appropriation. I have no doubt it can find room to spend $5,000,000, and spend it profitably, but I do protest against the careless method in which we are considering and passing our appropriation bills.

There is $100,000 carried in this appropriation bill that I have not yet been able to find a single "t" or an "i" in reference to except what was incidentally mentioned by the Senator from Utah this afternoon, and I should like to comment upon that for a moment. There is nothing furnished to us by the Committee on Agriculture of either House as to this $100,000. The Book of Estimates asked for $114,300 and three million and some odd hundred dollars, making a total of $3,196,200. The bill as it comes to us is for $3,296,200, with no information as to where or what the $100,000 is for until the slight intimation given by the Senator from Utah this afternoon.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. For the information of the Senator from Wyoming I will say that there was a supplemental estimate for the $100,000; that the Secretary specificially stated that it was for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act of June 11, 1906; and that is for the examination of homestead entries in the forest reserves.

Mr. WARREN. Will my colleague give me a moment? I have in my hand the special estimate.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is what I should like to see.

Mr. WARREN. It was sent up from the Treasury Department. It seems to have started with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and it is dated December 11, which of course would be later than the general Book of Estimates.

> DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
> GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
> Washington, D. C., December 11, 1907.
> SIR: I submit herewith an estimate for an appropriation to cover the cost of surveying homesteads within national forests. The act of June 11, 1906 (34 Stats., 233), provides among other things that—

I will read it; it is short—

> "Any entryman desiring to obtain patent to any lands described by metes and bounds entered by him under the provisions of this act shall within five years of the date of making settlement file, with the required proof of residence and cultivation, a plat and field notes of the lands entered, made by or under the direction of the United States surveyor-general, showing accurately the boundaries of such land which shall be distinctly marked * * * and further that any agricultural lands within forest reserves may, at the discretion of the Secretary, be surveyed by metes and bounds."

Then the Commissioner goes on:

It not infrequently happens that settlements are made upon unsurveyed lands within national forests, and an entry of such land necessitates a survey either at the expense of the settler or at the expense of the Government. For the purpose of relieving themselves of the expense of making these surveys, many settlers are, with the sanction of the Forestry Service, petitioning this Office for surveys to be paid for out of the general appropriation for the survey of public lands. In making an estimate for the next fiscal year for the purpose of defraying the expense of the survey of the public lands, surveys within forest reserves were not taken into consideration, and they should not, in my judgment, be paid for out of the appropriation which was intended for the survey of public lands outside of forest reserves. It is, therefore, respectfully suggested that you make the necessary recommendation—

It is directed to the Secretary of the Interior—

It is therefore respectfully suggested that you make the necessary recommendation to secure an appropriation for the purpose of making such surveys.

Very respectfully, R. A. BALLINGER, Commissioner.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am sorry the Senator from Utah has left the Chamber, because the explanation of the Senator from Utah, who seems to be thoroughly posted on this matter, as well as my colleague, of course, and the Senator from Utah was specifically informed, undoubtedly, by the Bureau——

Mr. WARREN. I will state to the Senator that this is only one among the several supplemental estimates submitted for appropriations. The bill does not contain all the estimates sent in for various items.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; but I say I regret that the Senator from Utah is not here, because the explanation of the Senator from Utah was entirely different from the one given by my colleague.

Mr. WARREN. I am not giving this explanation; I am reading from a regular public estimate, and I concluded that the purpose for which they asked this money, which was satisfactory to me, would be satisfactory to my colleague. Expense of surveys, of course, includes inspection of same. This is always the case.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand that this money is not to be used for that purpose at all.

Mr. WARREN. That is what it is estimated for.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is what I understand from the only explanation that I have had. It seems that there is a difference between those who are supposed to know.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the Senator from Wyoming whether he has referred to page 300 of the House hearings, in which Mr. Pinchot gives a detailed statement of the sum of $2,000,000, which he desires for the improvement of the forests entirely outside of the expenses of administration included in the $3,000,000 covered in this bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator will observe that he gives a summary by States and Territories—Arizona, $166,000; Arkansas, $30,000; California, $321,000, and so on, going through all the States. He makes up a total of $2,000,000. Then he gives in detail all the forests, according to States, and shows what will be necessary in each forest. In those estimates he asks, for instance, in one forest for 10 miles of drift fence, 2 miles of pasture fence, three watering troughs, and in other forests for four inexpensive cabins, to cost $450 each.

There are a great number of forests in each State, and the total estimate is given in great detail, covering about twenty-five or thirty pages of reading, and amounts in all to $2,000,000.

Now, I would ask the Senator from Wyoming whether he would deny the Forester the money necessary to improve these forests for the purpose of properly administering the grazing and for the purpose of providing cabins—inexpensive cabins—for the foresters. Will not the entire administration of these forests fail unless the practical expenditure is met outside of the mere expenses of administration, salaries, and so forth, which will permit all these improvements that are intended to aid the people in their grazing facilities, to aid in the administration of the forests, and to provide cabins for the foresters?

I find the items made up almost entirely of fences, watering troughs, cabins, barns, and things of that kind. Of course, the number of forests is so large and the number of States so many that, in the aggregate, it is a large amount; but the Senator will find that the expense for each forest is a very small one, amounting to not more than from $25,000 to $150,000 each.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, the Senator's inquiry is very pertinent, and I will answer him without hesitation. No; I would not, if I had my way, allow the full amount estimated for the improvement of the forests at the present time. Certainly if the forests amount to anything, or if their administration amounts to anything, it must be a matter of slow growth, it must be a matter of taking step after step, providing one step, and then taking another, a matter of a great deal of administration.

What we complain of more than anything else is the idea of seeking to do everything in one year, when we know very well that it can not be done. We would not say, make the American Navy as you would want it fifty years from now, and lay all the keels in one year. We would say do it year by year and from time to time as the country can afford it. The Senator knows very well, from the advices which we have had from those best qualified to know, that the United States is confronted with an annual deficit of nearly $100,000,000 now.

These forests have gone on without this expenditure of $1,000,000 a year for a great many years, and I think we can well afford to make our advance slowly, all the time having the definite end in mind of accomplishing permanently good results to the Forest Service of the future.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me remind the Senator that Mr. Pinchot asked for $2,000,000 for these permanent improvements in the numerous forests in thirteen or fourteen States and Territories, and the committee has allowed him only $500,000. I certainly do not see how the Senator can contend——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. So far as this appropriation bill shows, I do not know that they have allowed him anything for these objects; but I do know that there is an item in this appropriation bill of $500,000 to be expended at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture. I do not know, if this bill becomes a law, whether the appropriation is for building fences or for building cabins or what it is for, but I simply know that it is a fund to be used at the sweet will and pleasure of one man. To that sort of an appropriation I object; and I further object to it because I believe the appropriation is excessive in amount.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It would be very easy for the Senator from Wyoming to move to restrict this $500,000, or, if a larger sum shall be allowed, as I hope it will be—a million dollars—by providing that the expenditures shall be made for the items covered by this estimate included in the hearings before the House committee, on page 324. Of course it would be very easy to put all of those items into the bill itself, but it seems to me entirely unnecessary. It is well known that this $500,000 is for those items estimated for, and they are there given with great particularity.

The Senator from Wyoming admits that this work is necessary, but he says it should not all be undertaken in one year.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I did not admit that the work was necessary at all at the present time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understood, Mr. President, the Senator to admit—though I may have been mistaken in that—that this expenditure would in time be necessary, but that he objected to the expenditure all in one year. Now, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the committee has only allowed one-fourth of the amount asked for. Mr. Pinchot presents the pressing necessity of this entire expenditure. I ask whether the committee could have acted in a more reasonable way, in accordance with the Senator's views, than it has done?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. On that line of argument, I suppose, if Mr. Pinchot had presented an estimate of $20,000,000, the committee would have allowed him $5,000,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator from Wyoming will permit me, I desire to redirect his attention to the $100,000 item.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. We were considering that when I was interrupted by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. HEYBURN. It has been stated, as I understand the acting chairman of the committee, that that was for the purpose of surveying those tracts upon which settlers within the forest reserves made application to enter under the homestead law, under the act of June 11, 1906. I think I was correct in understanding it so.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Government does not pay that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understood the acting chairman of the committee to say that that was the purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The acting chairman of the committee did not state that that was the purpose, but he read a bulletin or estimate of some sort from the Office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which stated that that was the purpose.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I call attention to the fact that the Government does not make those surveys at its expense; but that the act of June 11, 1906, provides that those surveys shall be made at the expense of the settler, and it expressly in detail provides how those surveys shall be made under the direction of the surveyor-general of the State, in the same manner as is now provided in mining claims. I have the statute before me.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly; but I was speaking with the permission of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. It is but proper to say that it never was intended by the framers of that law that the United States should pay for the surveys contemplated by the act.

Mr. HEYBURN. And it is not so provided.

Mr. CARTER. It was not so provided and was not intended to be so provided, and no appropriation was ever made and none ever should be made for such surveys any more than for the surveys of mining claims.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] will permit me, it was to point out the fallacy of the claim that they should have this extra $100,000 for that purpose that I was led to refer to the text of the statute itself in order that there might be no misunderstanding about it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, recurring to the $100,000 to which I called attention, I think my colleague, the acting chairman of the committee, was misled by the order which he read. I think I was informed by the Senator from Utah, in his speech this afternoon, that the purpose of this $100,000 was to pay for the examination of lands supposedly sought to be entered under the homestead law. I have not the detailed information that the Senator has. He has somewhere, I think, a statement or an estimate showing the officers and the exact amount that will be necessary in order to perform this service according to the view of the Department. I wish I might have that. I saw a copy of it, and I wanted to direct some remarks toward that particular point.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have not with me the matter, as I have not my papers here. If the Senator does not want to go on with this particular subject, I would like to refer to the $500,000 appropriation.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to go on with this particular subject for a moment.

Mr. WARREN. Before my colleague goes on with that, I think the acting chairman of the committee had better state his grounds. I simply read from the regular estimates sent from the Treasury Department. The question raised by my colleague was that he did not know upon what authority that money was appropriated and that he could find no estimate.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Not at all.

Mr. WARREN. I simply read from that estimate.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then, do I understand my colleague to say that this $100,000 is provided for in this appropriation bill upon and to carry out the estimate which he now holds in his hand?

Mr. WARREN. So far as the $100,000 is concerned, it is just like the $500,000. We looked the papers over. The House had put into this bill certain appropriations, and when we looked through the estimates we found them largely in excess of the appropriations. There was this estimate of $100,000 and some other estimates that could or could not have been included, and we saw there was room enough at least for that amount of money to be appropriated and not exceed or even equal the estimate. The same is true as to the $500,000. It is only one-fourth of the estimate that was submitted.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I am getting no light. I am trying to find out, and I am trying to find out from those who know or who are supplied with the information, as to what these appropriations are made for, and I am utterly unable to get it. I can not get it from the Book of Estimates; I can not get it from any hearings before the committee of either House; and when I come upon the floor of the Senate I find the acting chairman of the committee citing one estimate and the spokesman of the Bureau, on the other hand, citing another estimate as to what this $100,000 is to be used for.

Now, Mr. President, that is simply an illustration of the very thing I am inveighing against this afternoon—that we are making a reckless, extravagant, uncalled-for appropriation, and we do not know what they are going to do with the money. It is no reflection on the Bureau of Forestry that they ask for $2,000,000; it is no reflection on the Bureau of Forestry that they have asked for $500,000 in one sum or for $100,000 in another sum; but it is a reflection upon us as Senators of the United States if we vote blindly for appropriations and are unable to find what the money is to be used for.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I take it for granted that the Senator is not so much objecting to the amount of $500,000 as——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not want now to go into the question of the $500,000; I want first to finish up the $100,000 item.

Mr. SMOOT. As the Senator is objecting to it being a lump sum——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I decline to be interrupted on the $500,000 appropriation until I get to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator had reached that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am seeking to find out, if I can, what the $100,000 is for. The Senator from Utah has in his possession information, undoubtedly, which shows that this $100,000 is to be used to pay the salaries and expenses of the men who are to examine homestead entries in the forest reserves, to see whether or not they embrace land proper to be included in homestead entries.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no detailed statement as to how many men are to be employed; I have no detailed statement as to where they shall be employed; I simply have the information, as I said here before to the Senator from Montana, that the $100,000 was to be appropriated for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act of June 11, 1906.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Well, if it is to be appropriated for that purpose, it is absolutely futile.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there has been——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. There has been objection made here that the Forestry Division are doing everything in their power to prevent homestead entries being made on forest reserves; and now when they come here to ask for $100,000 for the very purpose of hastening these entrymen securing title to their land, there is objection to it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Now, Mr. President, right there I will say there is only one thing necessary to be determined when a man enters a forest reserve for a homestead, and that is whether or not it is agricultural land.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is just exactly what this appropriation is for, so far as a portion of it is concerned. It is to find out whether it is agricultural land and carry out the provisions of the act of June 11, 1906.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And that appropriation provides for one general supervisor, for three or four deputy supervisors, and for twenty-eight appraisers. Mr. President, that is simply another instance of the effort that is being made to keep men off of these reserves. Instead of being an advantage, it is a distinct hindrance.

Mr. President, we are told, and it is reiterated in every convention that is held, and has been reiterated on this floor time and time again, that the purpose of this forest-reserve policy is to protect the poor man; and when we cite the fact that they are withdrawing agricultural land from entry we are told, "Why, the farmer can go in and make his homestead there, as he always could." Mr. President, the impediments that are put in the way of the settler are such that a man who can overcome them must be more than human. In the first place, notwithstanding the law says that these reserves shall be open and free to settlement, every proclamation that is issued warns settlers not to go into the reserves.

A man can not go into the reserves as he does upon public land and make a homestead. He must first go in and spy out the land. Then, if he sees a piece of land that he thinks would make a farm, he can not go to the nearest land office and file upon it; but he must make application for a view of that particular piece of land. Then the Forest Service sends a man to look after it to see whether or not it is fit for a farm. The Forest Service tells the man who is hunting a home and who has found a piece of land that he thinks will make a good farm and is willing to venture his future on it making a good farm, the Forest Service tells him whether it is good agricultural land; and if the Forest Service says it is not, there is no appeal. Instead of having one man of the Forest Service pass upon that matter, it is proposed to have not less than three—first, the ordinary appraiser; second, the next in command; and third, the general supervisor of this Service; and this $100,000, if it is granted, will be used, not to further the interests of the homesteader, but to further impede and harass him in seeking to make a home upon the public domain. Therefore, Mr. President, I protest against this appropriation of $100,000. If you would only let us cut the red-tape in that Western country we would make it something.

There are a number of other things about this appropriation as to which I should like to speak, but the Senator from Utah interrupted me in regard to the $500,000 appropriation, and I should now be glad to yield to him to ask his question.

Mr. SMOOT. I was simply going to ask this question: Why is it that the Senator objects to the lump-sum of $500,000 for the Forestry Service when every other Department of this Government, with the exception of two, has the same kind of appropriations every year?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator can see a dozen bureaus provided for in this bill, but can he show me any one of them that is like this one?

Mr. SMOOT. In relation to——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming The $500,000 appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, every bureau provided for in the bill receives a lump sum.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, not one other Bureau provided for in the bill receives a like appropriation in the same way.

Mr. SMOOT. Not specifically as a $500,000 appropriation or being provided for by two appropriations, perhaps, but the Senator knows why the $500,000 was carried in the original appropriation.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I know nothing of the sort.

Mr. SMOOT. It appears in the hearings before the House committee. The House thought proper to put it in there, and a year ago the appropriation of $500,000, for providing improvements on reserves, passed this body, and the Forester is only carrying out that same policy this year.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Why, Mr. President, the Senator is entirely, absolutely, and unqualifiedly mistaken.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I should like to know how, and I will certainly acknowledge it if I am.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There is no other sum appropriated in this bill that is not appropriated for some specific purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not make that statement at all. We were speaking of the other bureaus, and I said that the other bureaus secured lump-sum appropriations; and so they do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator—I was going to say willfully misunderstands me, but I will not do so, knowing that the Senator never willfully does anything wrong.

Mr. SMOOT. That is very nice of the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. We have a lump-sum appropriation in this bill for this very Bureau of over $3,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. It might be called a "lump-sum appropriation," but even then the percentage of the lump sum to the specific appropriations is very much less than in the case of a good many of the Departments of this Government.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator will bear with me until I finish my sentence, I think perhaps he and I can get on common ground and not be so greatly misunderstanding one another. This bill carries for this Bureau, first, a lump sum of, substantially, $3,000,000, and for every other bureau provided for in the bill, so far as I have seen, there is a substantial lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly as I said.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In addition to this lump-sum appropriation, however, which is for the purposes mentioned in the lump-sum appropriation itself, for this Bureau, is carried an additional appropriation of $500,000, to be used at the will and pleasure of the Secretary of Agriculture; and no other like appropriation is provided for any other bureau by this bill or any other bill, except for the Department of Justice.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no difference whatever between the Senator from Wyoming and myself as to that. That is just exactly as I wanted to say it, whether I did say it that way or not.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator simply said as to the sum of $500,000, of which we were speaking, that a like provision was carried for every bureau in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, Mr. President, not so broad as that; I do not think I said that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Well, we will call it off. I understood the Senator, and he understood me, I think.

Mr. WARREN. If my colleague will allow me, there need be no difficulty about it. If he will move to add the $500,000 under the other heading, making it that much more, I will accept it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, that suggestion has been made several times. If we do not succeed in stopping what we think is an uncalled-for and extravagant appropriation, Senators may rest assured that this practice of making an appropriation in this way will be sought to be stopped in the way they suggest.

Mr. WARREN. Well, Mr. President, so far as the committee are concerned, they are only too ready to accept any amendment as to how the bill may be constructed next year that is conformable with other appropriaton bills; but if it shall be that the Senator wishes to reduce this amount, and failing in that, wishes then to control the manner of appropriation, it would hardly seem to be comity for him then to move it. He should either take one or the other horn of the dilemma.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am obliged to my colleague for the suggestion, but I fail to see where there would be anything unseemly if one amendment is defeated that another should be proposed.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. With great pleasure.

Mr. CARTER. It may possibly be agreeable to the acting chairman of the committee to explain to the Senate why an aggregate sum for a given purpose generally stated was divided into two items. What was the purpose of the division? Why was it not originally consolidated as one item when the two items relate to the same purpose and might well have been included in an aggregate sum?

I believe on that subject the committee is silent. It is rare that things are done without some purpose. This seems an unusual thing. Why was it done in this way?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to his colleague?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to say that, first, the Senate committee did not construct the bill. Second, the Senate committee did not amend it in this particular. As to why the House constructed the bill this way, while it may not be a sufficient reason, it was exactly the way the bill was framed last year. As to appropriation bills, in Congress we are very apt to follow the language of the last law—I am speaking of it, of course, at a distance, because the bill, as I said before, was constructed in the House.

We are very apt to follow this year the language of last year, and last year that of the year before, with respect to the division referred to by the Senator from Montana. I will say that it is exactly as it was a year ago. But the idea, as explained to me when I asked that same question of the House committee, was, first, that it was the same as last year and could be so understood, and, second, the first amount was for the care, general administration, and such improvements as might be necessary and could be made with that sum. Then they asked for an additional $2,000,000, giving all the items by States, and subdividing the States into separate forest reserves, and then separating each amount into items, and it will be observed in looking them over that they are of a more permanent nature—that is, for telephones, for bridges, for barns, for cabins, and matters of that kind not mentioned in the first paragraph.

Mr. CARTER. But the singular feature connected with the phraseology is what strikes me as rendering the duplication unnecessary. The item of three million and odd dollars is appropriated for substantially the same purpose specified for the $500,000 appropriation. I can readily understand that if the three million and odd thousand dollars had been appropriated for general administrative purposes, it would be questionable whether construction would be regarded as administration; whether under the guise of administration telephone lines or buildings could be constructed; and it would have followed very logically, I can see, to make a subsequent item of $500,000 for construction purposes. A reason would thereby be found for a change or subdivision. But it happens in this case that the phraseology as to both items is substantially the same.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator from Wyoming permit me?

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator from Nevada will permit me just to finish this statement.

In my service in connection with appropriation bills I have made the same observations time and again concerning different appropriations where it seemed as though two or more sums could well be in one paragraph and under one head, but I make the statement here now that you not only find such cases in this bill, but in a great many other appropriation bills that come here. Of course this discussion arises for the purpose of cutting down this amount. That is all there is to that, and we understand it so. But if you pick up almost any appropriation bill one could well ask the same question which is now asked of me with respect of this bill. I will say to the Senator that he can take up a bill which he has probably helped to construct, for the Post-Office Department, and find very nearly the same repetition also, including lump sums of twenty to forty million dollars for various purposes, and so on.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Most gladly.

Mr. CARTER. I called on the chairman of the committee for information, which seemed to me perfectly proper. I did not understand that I thereby became subject to the criticism of being possessed of a desire to interpose opposition to an appropriation by any indirect method.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. CARTER. Any appropriation I oppose here I am perfectly willing to oppose in the open.

Mr. WARREN. I did not intend to infer or insinuate that the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] was making any objection to the appropriation; but my colleague had already stated that he considered the amount too large, and proposed to move to reduce it, and thus this discussion arose.

Mr. SMOOT. Just one word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the appropriation of $3,000,000, in round numbers, in a lump sum, is for the purpose of meeting the expenses that will be absolutely necessary for the maintenance of the reserves. The $500,000 is for permanent improvements, and could be done without. But if it were in one lump sum and reduced to $500,000, the question would arise, Will the Forester use of the reduced amount a fund for the permanent improvement and cut short something else for the maintenance of the reserves?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The most marvelous thing about this whole business is the extreme looseness of understanding. There is nothing in this bill from A to Z that says that the $500,000 is to be used for permanent improvements.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; having gotten through with one sentence at last, I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I shall interrupt the Senator for only a moment. I think perhaps I can give the Senator from Montana some information regarding his inquiry.

This item for the first time appeared a year ago. Prior to that time the only item that appeared in the appropriation bill regarding the Forestry Service appeared in front of this item of $500,000. But last year for the first time an attack was made upon the method which had been pursued of putting the proceeds from the sales of timber into a fund against which the Forester drew for permanent improvements. The Congress revolutionized that practice. The result was that the Secretary of Agriculture came before the Senate committee and presented the fact that the Service would lack a million dollars necessary to its proper administration. The Senate committee therefore put in this item of $500,000 to cover moneys which otherwise would in the ordinary administration of the Forestry Service have been expended without appropriation by Congress out of the moneys received from the sales of timber, and so forth. So in that way that practice grew up. They have simply followed the item of last year.

But the Senator will find, on pages 300 to 326, the items of the $500,000 given with great particularity——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There is no question about that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And a gross item of $2,000,000, which has been cut down to $500,000.

Mr. CARTER. I was not dealing with the details of the expenditure, but with the method of appropriation. The explanation of the Senator from Nevada does not quite satisfy my mind, I am sorry to say.

Last year Congress did not revolutionize, but it compelled the Forestry Service to do what every collection agency of the United States Government does—pay the collections into the Treasury—whereas theretofore they had been collecting and disbursing without any sort of connection with appropriations by Congress.

When that disposition was made, a provision was put in the bill to the effect that the existing fund in the hands of the Forester might be used, the receipts up to the 1st of July might be used, and in addition, to meet any deficiency for the coming year, the appropriation was made to which the Senator refers. That contingency has now passed. No such exigency exists, and that which led to that peculiar line of legislation last year can not be urged as a reason for its repetition this year.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Montana has the same recollection exactly of the appropriation of last year that I have, and which in a weak sort of a way I tried to give to the Senate a few minutes ago.

Now, I want to ask the Senate this; I want to ask the chairman of the committee or any member of the Appropriations Committee; I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs—suppose the Committee on Naval Affairs should bring in here a bill providing $120,000,000 for the support of the Navy for the year 1909, including in that all the general terms of such an appropriation, and then should come in and ask the Senate of the United States to add to that appropriation the sum of eighteen or twenty million dollars to be paid out at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. Would the Senate take kindly to an appropriation of that sort? And yet in kind and in percentage it would be exactly a duplicate of the appropriation presented here.

I have gone further into this appropriation than I intended, but I have hardly touched upon forest reserves. There are a few matters which have been called to the attention of the Senate to which I wish to direct my attention.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] makes the statement, with which I heartily agree, that the public lands of the United States belong to the people of the United States or to the Government of the United States and not to the citizens of any particular State. I agree to that, but I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that the people of a particular State have a peculiar interest in the lands within their borders which is not shared by the people of any other State; and it is of the utmost concern to the people of the State which I represent, to the people of the States wherever these forest reserves are, that they should be administered in such a way as will best conserve the interests of the National Government and the interest of that particular State, especially, and not be allowed to impede the development of the State nor harass the people in any of their lawful undertakings.

Mr. President, I do not share in the idea that our natural resources are going to be exhausted. There is a great crusade being carried on up and down the line, shouted in our ears and through the press, that we are soon going to be without timber with which to build our houses, and that we are soon going to be without coal to warm our hearths. And we are urged to take immediate steps to withdraw from the use of the people as individuals all of our natural resources.

I want to make a statement supplementing the statement of the Senator from Colorado in regard to coal. The State of Wyoming has 30,000 square miles underlaid with coal. Within 50 miles of my own town is a coal field in which there is one vein of coal alone—and it is not the only one—which from floor to roof has 90 feet of solid coal, without a parting as big as a lead pencil.

There are 90,000 tons of coal in every acre of that land, and down below that vein there is another and another and another and another. No man can measure the possibilities of the coal fields of the United States. As was said by somebody in the debate yesterday—I think it was the the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]—long before the coal is exhausted men will be doing without coal, and the most worthless land on the face of the earth in that day will be the coal land we are now so anxious to preserve.

Mr. President, it would take overmuch time to go into further details. I know the debate has been long. I know it has been very tiresome. In many phases it has been uninteresting.

I realize that the Senator from Nebraska was probably right when he said this morning that we wasted two or three days in useless wrangling, seeking to accomplish things that could not be accomplished.

Mr. President, I shall not be surprised if again this year, as in the past, we are run over by the steam roller. But we are going to try to insist from this time on, year after year, that the affairs of the Forestry Bureau shall be conducted as the affairs of other bureaus of this Government are; that there shall not be the sentiment worked in this Bureau that carries people off their feet; that there shall be nothing done by the Bureau of Forestry that can not be done in their legitimate spheres by other bureaus of this Government.

Mr. President, the difficulty with this whole forest business is indicated by a statement which I will read. It states my position and, I think, the position of nearly everyone who stands with me upon this whole forestry proposition. It shows we are not against the forest reserves. It shows we are against some of the administrative measures of the forest reserves.

It shows what we fear for the future and that we want to confine the activities and the business of this Bureau within its legitimate scope and within the scope for which it was created by law. I am going to take the liberty of reading it at length. It is from the Cincinnati Commercial Tribune of April 24:

Francis Perry Elliott, formerly editor of the Home Magazine of New York and a well-known Eastern magazine writer, has been visiting friends in Cincinnati during the past week.

Mr. Elliott hails at present from Denver, where he went for his health two years ago, and has built up a great popular representative magazine for the Rocky Mountain region. Yesterday he talked entertainingly to a Commercial Tribune representative.

"The most interesting question in the Far West just now," said Mr. Elliott, "is the problem of the disposition and administration of Uncle Sam's public domain, especially the national forests. You know that practically all our national forests are in the West. They are very carefully and scientifically tended.

"A great deal has been accomplished in the past six years in perfecting the Service, and the credit for this is due to the President, Secretary Wilson, and Mr. Pinchot, the Chief Forester. But there is spreading widely a sentiment that we are 'slopping over' a little in the matter of the forest reserves."

"Are the people out West opposed, then, to forest reserves?" he was asked.

"Not on your life," said Mr. Elliott, emphatically. "Nowhere in the whole world are people in such intimate and intelligent sympathy with the purpose of forest reserves as out in the arid West. Irrigation has transformed the Great American Desert—irrigation, you understand, not rain. It is still 'the land of the rainless years.' But the water for spring and summer irrigation comes, of course, from the melting snows caught and held through the winter in the arms of the mountain forests. You people here in the Middle West long ago realized your wanton prodigality with your forests; your floods and the alternate droughts and the wasting soil have created an alarm only second to that caused by your vanishing timber supply.

"Your farmers depend upon rain, and must continue to do so; but out in the Rocky Mountains we are chiefly concerned about snow. The first snowflake in winter is the farmer's star of hope. These mountain forests are therefore perpetual reservoirs, and the people realize their dependence upon them.

"The dissatisfaction I refer to is not with the institution, therefore, but with some features of the administration of the national forests. It is right to be zealous about our national forests, right to learn to use them and not abuse them, but it is not right to be fanatical and to sacrifice all the comfort, prosperity, and development of the West to-day for the sake of locking up a vast undeveloped domain for posterity, if that domain, or portions of it, does not contain any forests, never did, and never will contain any forests; does not minister in any way to the conservation of water supply, and is absolutely fit for no purpose except for agriculture or grazing. There are millions and millions of acres of this sort that are locked up from the people in the forest reserves.

"Another thing you want to remember," he continued, "we do not consider in the West that the agricultural lands of the public domain belong to the people of the West alone. We are specially anxious to impress that they belong to the citizens of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and every other State. Anybody may go out there and take them up in the manner the law specifies. The people of the West want settlers to come; they want them more than anything else in the world. The act of June 4, 1897, which set aside timbered areas of mountain watersheds for forest reserves, specifically and distinctly forbids the including of lands good only for other purposes. The idea was that the interest of the settler should have first consideration. Land unavailable for timber protection or reforestation, or for conserving the flow of streams, was to be kept open for farms and homes and communities. This principle is not being adhered to and the people do not like it, for it is restricting settlement.

"There is too much red tape about our forest reserves; too much elaboration and complication of system; too many obstacles are placed in the way of settlers; too many expenses, exasperations, and petty humiliations. This is one reason why so many American settlers are passing over the Government lands of our broad domain and journeying into Canada by thousands. Too much power is placed in the hands of the petty employees, and it is only too common to find people afraid to make complaint to superior officers. This condition of things results from the latitude possible under a system of government by Department regulations within the reserves rather than by a detailed and defined code of laws."

That, Mr. President, is the sum and substance of two days' debate upon this floor. The very things which he mentions are the very things that are complained of, the very opposition that he says here is the opposition to the administration of the forests is the opposition complained of on the floor of the Senate.

"For example," said Mr. Elliott, "the law creating the forest reserves certainly never contemplated that a citizen living 10 or 20 miles away from one should be liable for prosecution for trespass and damages in case his wandering stock drifted on a reserve. You know in the open West cattle stray sometimes for ten, twenty, or even a hundred miles; and then these forest reserves are not fenced. The law contemplated protecting forest reserves, but never contemplated making a man a trespasser on one without his own knowledge or overt act. But the regulation says, whether intentionally or otherwise. This is pretty hard.

Eastern people and their Congressional representatives should wake up to the fact that whatever menaces the public lands in the great West menaces something that is the property of the whole nation. This is not a local question—this matter of public lands and the forest reserves—it is the biggest kind of a national question. Just now there is a scheme on foot to have Congress authorize the turning over to the Forest Service (and leasing for grazing purposes)—

There is no question about the correctness of this information, because it is embodied in bills in both Houses of Congress—

(and leasing for grazing purposes) something over 3,000,000 acres of the unappropriated public domain. This would shut out settlers from a pretty big strip of country—well, equivalent to an area 200 miles wide and over 2,000 miles long. The big cattle barons favor this scheme, for the day of the open range is passing and the settler is crowding the big cattlemen up against the Rocky Mountains. The only portion of the open range that the settler does not want is the vast arid stretch, such as is found up in Wyoming, treeless—

There is very little of it there—without possibilities as to irrigation, with no good herbage or forage, except sage brush, and good for all time for no purpose except sheep grazing.

Under the proposed leasing policy, any cattle baron may lease and fence as much as 10,000 acres; his friend may lease next door to him 10,000 more, and his friend next, and so on. They may fence this area up, and if they spend as much as $100 upon their leasehold, this debars any settler from entering. You see this is all mighty fine for the fellow with a long purse. But I have been out among the small ranchmen, homesteaders, and small cattle and sheep men—and, by the way, these small men constitute about 80 per cent of those engaged in the cattle or sheep industry—and they regard this leasing scheme as ruin for them and only for the benefit of the few who have the wealth and prosperity. So we people out West do not want the public domain leased in great baronies to a favored few, and our agricultural lands tied up so as to debar the settler, as would be the case with these ten-year leases.

Now, Mr. President, I have said more than I intended to say, more, surely, than I ought to have said. At the proper time, when the amendment of the Senator from Idaho is disposed of, I shall move to strike out, on page 25, from line 16 to line 21, inclusive—that portion of the appropriation against which I have attempted to direct my remarks, with the earnest hope that the Senate will come down from the mountain top of a mistaken sentiment and give its vote along cool, reasonable, and definite lines.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent that that portion of the hearings in the House in relation to this appropriation of $500,000, contained on pages 299 to 327, containing all the items included in this appropriation, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the matter he has stated included in the House hearings in regard to this appropriation be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. You have spent $500,000 during the current year.

Mr. PINCHOT. We are spending it.

The CHAIRMAN. Just for this purpose. How much do you think you could economically expend for the purpose during the next fiscal year?

Mr. PINCHOT. Two millions. I should like to ask for two millions with authority to continue that expenditure until January 1, 1909, instead of July 1, 1908, for this reason: You get pieces of work of this kind started and they necessarily run right through the summer. The break at the beginning of the fiscal year, July 1, makes us a great deal of trouble and prevents us from carrying on work straight through, this improvement work. If it were possible for you to give the Forest Service a reasonable sum for this work and allow that sum to be expended for a year and a half instead of just a year, it would be of advantage.

Mr. HAWLEY. You mean January 1, 1910, do you not?

Mr. PINCHOT. Yes; 1910. It would help us very much indeed in the business conduct of our work.

The CHAIRMAN. Two million dollars to be expended over a stretch of territory covering many hundreds of miles in the construction of trails and roads and ditches and telephone lines is a very large sum of money, and the work would necessarily require high organization and a great many overseers of large responsibility. Is your Bureau organized, do you think, in such a way that you could spare men enough to do that overseeing and economically expend that $2,000,000?

Mr. PINCHOT. I think, when I read the amount that would be spent in each forest—I have a detailed estimate here for each forest—you will see, Mr. Chairman, that the problem becomes comparatively easy. For example, in California, on the Trinity National Forest, the total expenditure would be $15,000; on the Gunnison in Colorado, $11,000; on the Las Animas, $2,400, and so on. This money would be expended under the supervision of these various forest supervisors, who are, for the most part, thoroughly well-trained men. I will insert the detailed estimate in the record. It is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. You have estimates there calling for this $2,000,000?

Mr. PINCHOT. I have detailed estimates for every national forest, showing just how it would be spent. I would present these with the statement that they indicate that the Service is pretty well aware of the situation and knows what is needed in the different forests.

Mr. POLLARD. That $2,000,000 you want in the administration of the present forest reserves?

Mr. PINCHOT. Yes; not in the administration, Mr. POLLARD, but in making these permanent improvements. I would like to spend that much money in making permanent improvements, if I make that clear.

Mr. POLLARD. How much, may I ask, do you think you ought to have of an increase for this work of cooperation with the private foresters?

Mr. PINCHOT. I think if you will let me treat the forests from the point of view I have suggested, I can just about double, or a little less than double, with great advantage, the money spent on that. We are spending on all kinds of cooperative work and investigation and study of the forests about $300,000, or slightly over that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. WARREN. I will state to the Chair that that is not exactly the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair understood that to be the question.

Mr. WARREN. I understand. I wish to state that I did not object at the time the amendment was offered to its being submitted and discussed, but under the unanimous-consent arrangement the committee amendments were to be first considered. The first amendment, the one at the bottom of page 22 and the top of page 23, was considered and stricken out on a point of order. The next amendment occurs in line 18, on page 23.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. After the words "United States," in line 23, on page 22, I move to insert the words that were stricken out on a point of order.

Mr. WARREN. Let me understand my colleague. He wishes to reinstate the entire amendment?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask the Senator if he had not better wait until we get the bill into the Senate. The Senate as in Committee of the Whole has acted upon it once.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am not specially concerned, but I was laboring under a misapprehension, and I am willing to let it remain in the bill.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask, for information, if it went out on a point of order.

Mr. WARREN. It went out on a point of order. I have forgotten whether my colleague made the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I made the point of order.

Mr. WARREN. If he wishes to withdraw the point of order and reinstate the amendment, we can ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The motion I made was to move the amendment inserting after the words "United States," on page 22, line 23, the words following in italics, including the word "Islands" on page 23, line 1, which were stricken out on a point of order made by myself.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] reminds me that he made the point of order. I was of the opinion when the matter was called to my attention by my colleague that a point of order could not lie, as the proposed amendment was the existing law, as to a part of it, but the Vice-President decided that it was obnoxious to the rule, and it went out on a point of order. Now, if my colleague and the Senator from Colorado, one of whom made the point of order, will settle it by both withdrawing, we will have it brought up.

Mr. TELLER. I think we both made the point of order.

Mr. FLINT. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] made the point of order, if I remember correctly.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Oregon also made the point of order. I made it, certainly. The Chair sustained the point of order, and the amendment is not before the Senate now.

Mr. HALE. No; a motion to reinsert it does not get at it, because that is just as much subject to a point of order as the original proposition.

Mr. TELLER. Precisely.

Mr. HALE. The motion to reinsert is an amendment; and if the original clause went out on a point of order, any motion to reinstate the amendment would be subject to the same point of order.

Mr. WARREN. It can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will ask unanimous consent and obtain it, it can be done.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think the motion I made was the proper one. If there is any objection to it, of course I realize that it is subject to a point of order the same as the original proposition; but if nobody raises a point of order against the amendment, I suppose it will carry and the words will go back into the bill.

Mr. TELLER. The amendment is out on a point of order. I do not see anything here to discuss.

Mr. WARREN. The next amendment is, on line 18, page 23. The committee will ask that that may be disagreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, line 18, insert the word "hereafter," so as to read:

And hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, permit timber and other forest products cut or removed from the national forests, except the Black Hills National Forest in South Dakota, to be exported from the State, Territory, or the district of Alaska in which said forests are respectively situated.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 24, line 3, after the word "checked," to insert "but in no case after July 1, 1910," so as to read:

That the exportation of dead and insect-infested timber only from said Black Hills National Forest shall be allowed until such time as the Forester shall certify that the ravages of the destructive insects in said forest are practically checked, but in no case after July 1, 1910.

Mr. WARREN. I will state that this amendment was objected to when we came to it by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], but that he has since withdrawn his objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 9, after the word "elsewhere," to insert:

And hereafter advances of money under any appropriation for the Forest Service may be made to the Forest Service and by authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to chiefs of field parties for fighting forest fires in emergency cases, who shall give bond under such rules and regulations and in such sum as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct, and detailed accounts arising under such advances shall be rendered through and by the Department of Agriculture to the Treasury Department.

Mr. TELLER. I am not going to object to the amendment, even if it is susceptible to a point of order. I only want to say I regard it as an extremely vicious practice; but I know if I object to it, it will be said that I am afraid to allow the Department to have the means of carrying out what they profess is their purpose. However, I will venture to say that this is the first time we have ever put money in the hands of people in this way.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no, Mr. President. The Geological Survey and, I think, other bureaus have had this privilege.

Mr. TELLER. It is possible we have done something of that kind, but I do not remember it in any bill. I do not believe it exists in any bill, but as they will give bond, and possibly it might embarrass the Department if they did not have it, I am not going to raise a question against it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 25, line 3, to strike out the period and insert a colon and the word "Provided," and in line 9, after the word "Provided," to insert "further."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 7, before the word "Service," to strike out "Forestry" and insert "Forest;" and in line 11, before the word "of," to strike out "preparation" and insert "publication," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used to pay the transportation or traveling expenses of any forest officer or agent except he be traveling on business directly connected with the Forest Service and in furtherance of the works, aims, and objects specified and authorized in and by this appropriation: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid or used for the purpose of paying for, in whole or in part, the publications of any newspaper or magazine article.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 20, after the word "the," to strike out "national forests" and insert "National Forests," so as to make the clause read:

And there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000, to be expended as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct for the proper and economical administration, protection, and development of the National Forests.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. That completes the amendments offered by the committee, Mr. President.

Mr. HEYBURN. The amendment striking out the word "preparation" and inserting "publication" in line 11, page 25, was passed over so rapidly that it escaped my attention. I understood that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] intended to object to the committee amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I intended to ask that the committee amendment be disagreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will consider the question on the amendment open and put it again.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask the Senate to disagree to that amendment of the committee. I will state to my colleague why I ask that this action be taken.

Mr. WARREN. Excuse me; my attention was diverted.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I started to say that I ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment proposed by the committee in line 11, page 25. I do this not because I object to the use of the word "publication," but because I think the word "preparation" should remain in the bill and the word "or" should be inserted before "publication," so as to read "preparation or publication."

Mr. WARREN. Was the Senator in the Chamber, and did he observe what I said in the discussion yesterday about this? I will, in just a word, give the Senator the reason the committee had for changing it through the amendment offered.

The Forester was examined, as well as the Secretary of Agriculture, and they understood perfectly that there was to be no money paid out for newspaper or magazine articles. The Secretary asked that we might not use the word "preparation" unless we thought it strictly necessary, because it was the cheapest and most effectual way that matter could be furnished to the newspapers as they called for material, from time to time, for information regarding the work. He said unless they were able to put it in some typewritten or other form so that it could be seen, some of the clerks or the heads of bureaus were almost constantly being—I will not say annoyed—engaged in submitting to interviews with newspaper and magazine men and in explaining and giving out items of news or information of what was going on. To have it prepared beforehand and ready for use when inquired for is the cheaper and better way.

The committee did not see why the inhibition should be stronger than it is now, which reads:

That no part of this appropriation shall be paid or used for the purpose of paying for in whole or in part the publication of any newspaper or magazine article.

It is not the intention of the Department to go into the business under this appropriation of preparing articles expressly to be published in newspapers and magazines, but to dispose of news items and information in that way. Sometimes, for instance, there would be some embarrassment as to whether it was not a matter of preparation for publication for a newspaper if the Bureau should publish a bulletin, and, as my colleague well knows, the Department of Agriculture makes a practice under the law of publishing very many bulletins.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My desire is to do exactly what my colleague suggests, and that is to prevent the use of this appropriation for the preparation of newspaper and magazine articles by anyone, either inside or outside the service. If there is to be any publication made by this Bureau, I insist it should be made along the same lines that the publications of other bureaus are made. Other bureaus make their publications either through the general Department or by the bureaus themselves in the form of bulletins or statements or daily reports or things of that sort.

The fact that the Division of Forestry does not want to be restricted in preparing magazine articles and paying for them, and in preparing other things and paying for them, is the very reason why I want to have this word restored, because I do not want the Bureau of Forestry or any other Bureau of this Government to go into the business of spending Government money, either preparing articles for magazines or newspapers or editing them, to advance the interests of their particular Bureau.

I am perfectly frank in my statement. It has been denied that anything of this sort has been done. Yet this very bill carries provision for things of that sort in a moderate degree. We all know that the articles that appear in the newspaper are not volunteer articles.

We all know, further, that when a man takes a camera or a magic lantern and travels through State after State exploiting the glories of the Forestry Service free and without an admission fee, he is not doing it at his own expense. I want to cut off anything of that kind as far as I can.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator does not think there is any magic-lantern business in this?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; I am simply giving that as an illustration.

Mr. WARREN. May I say to my colleague, I think I should give, as he will, the Secretary of Agriculture the benefit of what he says, and also the Forester, who says that this is a matter of economy; that it takes the time of a clerk or two, or, perhaps three, in preparation work, when otherwise perhaps half a dozen men would be bothered by those who are seeking information. I give it as the Secretary of Agriculture and the Forester gave it to the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have read the hearings before the committee. I read the hearings pretty carefully, and I was more firmly convinced than ever that this restriction ought to be in the bill. Mr. Pinchot said specifically that he would prefer to have in the bill the word "publication," because, he said, we do not pay anything for publishing. That indicated, to my mind, that he did pay for the preparation of the magazine articles and newspaper reports, and I do not think it is a proper appropriation to be made.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming to Mr. Pinchot's statement regarding this item. I will read briefly from the hearings:

Senator MONEY. What I want to get at is why the Office of Publications can not deal with this matter and put it in bulletins, if it is worth going to the public at all. Why should each Bureau, like the Forestry Bureau, have its bureau of publications?

Secretary WILSON. They do not have their office of publications.

Senator MONEY. It is publication when you prepare material and send it off to somebody who publishes it. You do not print it in your office.

Let me say here that my recollection of the act creating the Agriculture Department is that one purpose is to disseminate useful information on subjects relating to that Department. Now, Mr. Pinchot makes this statement:

Mr. PINCHOT. May I explain how it came about? We found that our scientists had a great deal of information they did not want to give out, which is natural, because a man getting information in that way very seldom sees the necessity for the immediate publication of it. He wants to write a complete bulletin, a long treatise, that will be satisfactory to him from a scientific point of view, and which will not give popular information. We found that we could not get into the hands of the people a whole lot of valuable information that was being gathered at Government expense unless we had somebody in the Forest Service whose business it was to go to the different chiefs and scientific men and pick up what they had and then write it out so that the newspaper men could get it.

Out of that grew the custom of giving out the material in this way. As a result we get each month a distribution of our material which would be utterly impossible in any other way. We got track last month of about 23,000,000 copies of newspapers containing some information about forestry. Of course it would be absolutely impossible to make any publication through bulletins that would reach the public in that way. We were driven to it because we found that the bulletin method did not get out the facts that ought to be known about forestry widely enough among our own people. That is why we took this up. We print nothing but facts, no controversial material of any kind, no attacks on any man or any measure, and we have never paid a cent to any newspaper or magazine or to any newspaper man for publishing our material. They simply accept it as news or turn it down as news, as they please.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. Question in the House was made on the ground that you were spending money for articles in newspapers.

Mr. PINCHOT. Yes; the charge was made very definitely that we were paying newspapers and magazines for publishing our material.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, is that true or not?

Mr. PINCHOT. As a matter of fact, it is absolutely untrue. We never paid one cent.

Secretary WILSON. There are a few words that might be said in regard to this matter. This work is wholly done by the Bureau of Forestry. In consulting with Mr. Pinchot about it he made the same argument to me that he makes now to the committee, and I was willing to have the experiment tried; but it has not gone beyond his Bureau. The reason for that is that his Bureau is entirely new. We have destroyed our forests, and I thought I would let Mr. Pinchot ascertain what the value of this kind of work would be.

Senator MONEY. Has any estimate been made of the cost of the preparation of this material for newspapers or magazines?

Mr. PINCHOT. Yes; I suppose it costs between $5,000 and $6,000 a year.

Now, Mr. President, it seems that the sole purpose of preparing these circulars which are given out to the newspapers, abbreviated information of what is ordinarily presented in a bulletin, is to secure a wider circulation with the least cost to the Government of this very useful information. It seems to me it would be very unwise to provide that this method of publication, effective in the way of education and economical as to the cost, should be entirely done away with.

Of course if this is presented merely as an advocacy of appropriations and matters of that kind, it would be entirely inappropriate, but so far as the testimony of Mr. Pinchot shows, the whole purpose of it is commendable. He says:

No controversial material of any kind, no attacks on any man or any measure, and we have never paid a cent to any newspaper or magazine or to any newspaper man for publishing our material.

It is simply an effective way of giving out to the entire public through the newspapers abbreviated bulletins of information.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. With the amendment proposed by myself there would be no restriction whatever upon the proper dissemination of information from the Bureau. Mr. Pinchot himself says that he desires the right to pay for prepared articles for magazines and newspapers. I respectfully differ as to the wisdom of that policy from Mr. Pinchot and from the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. I do not believe it is a part of the business of the Government of the United States to subsidize writers. I think the legitimate object of the publications of the Departments is to disseminate through the particular Department, in whatever way it sees fit, information that it has on hand to the people who would be interested in such information; but to pay for the preparation of newspaper and magazine articles, I think, goes far beyond the proper function of this or any other bureau.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to call the attention of Senators to the real objection to this provision, and I think it will probably be a surprise to some of them. The proposition to restore the words "preparation or," and prohibit the use of public funds for that purpose, is more far-reaching than Senators might imagine. It has been the practice of the Forestry Service to prepare articles in defense of their policy, as they call it, and to send them to the newspapers of the country, accompanying such communications with franks, and requesting the newspaper, if it should publish the article, to send them a marked copy of the newspaper containing it under the Department frank.

I wish to ask any Senator here—and there are many older in the service than I—if that is a proper use of the frank? I will ask whether or not under the law it is permissible for a Senator writing in regard to official business to a constituent to send that constituent a frank under which to reply?

Mr. TELLER. I have never done so; and I do not believe that we have the right to do so.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to know if there is any law authorizing it.

Mr. TELLER. No; but there is a special law making it a crime against the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have had sent me, and I have in my possession, a specimen of this kind of work. I have in my possession a blank frank from the newspaper to whom one of these articles lauding the Forestry Service was sent with the request to publish it and when published to return a copy of the paper under this frank. Now, I merely call attention to that fact as a specimen of the manner of administration——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator from Idaho whether he would regard it as a violation of the franking act if the Department should send a bulletin prepared by one of the scientists of that Department upon the subject of forestry?

Mr. HEYBURN. They have a right to send out matter under a frank, but I have never known that it was the right of a party who enjoyed the privilege of using a frank to transfer it to his correspondent.

Mr. GALLINGER. To frank a newspaper?

Mr. HEYBURN. To frank a newspaper back.

Mr. TELLER. That can not lawfully be done.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do I understand that the custom is for the newspapers to frank publications back?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; in order that the Department might have the benefit of the published article. I make that statement, and there is no danger of them contradicting it, because, if they do, we will confront them with some of the evidence of it.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator make that statement believing that that is the general custom?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. I have been so told by a large number of newspapers in our section of country who have received these articles. I have seen the articles bearing the earmarks of this Bureau. I have inquired as to how they came, and I have been advised by the proprietors and editors of the papers of the circumstances that I have related. I requested a certain reputable daily newspaper in the State of Idaho to send me one of these communications, and I have it in my possession.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. FLINT. I would ask the Senator from Idaho whether there are a great many articles in the newspapers of Idaho favorable to the Forest Service?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think that that is not very material to consider at this time, and that it would minimize to some extent the statement I have made, which I intend shall stand for itself. I did not rise to do more than to make the statement, and I do not think any Senator here will defend the right which is claimed for such a transaction.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that the Department does just exactly what the Senator from Idaho says. It is their custom to send out articles prepared by the Department to newspapers, and the articles are in defense of, or rather pertaining to, the Government work and the work of the Department.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment; I am not through. I do not think that that is the only Department that is doing this. I have frequently received letters from the various Departments asking questions of me and inclosing a franked envelope, and the answer has gone back to that Department in that franked envelope.

Mr. GALLINGER. Why do that, I will ask the Senator, when the Senator could send it back in his own franked envelope?

Mr. SMOOT. That was before I was a Senator of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is a complete answer to that. That was a communication requesting some official information for the Department; but this is a frank for a newspaper which contains no official communication to anybody, because these articles either to or from a newspaper are not official communications.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a question that people may differ on.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Utah, who speaks for and on behalf of this Bureau, admits that that is their custom, but he places it upon the ground that it is a custom. Mr. President, pretty soon we shall have a government of custom, instead of a government of law, and we are drifting toward it every day through this kind of legislation.

Now, just a word about the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming. The proposition is to restore the words "preparation for," so that the appropriation which we make can not be used for the purpose of franking publications for newspapers or magazines. What other branch of the Government of the United States publishes or writes or prepares articles and sends them out under that condition? I know of none; and I undertake to say that no other branch of the Government has ever dared to do it.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator from Idaho remember the prompt action of the Senate when we discovered that the Panama Canal Commission was doing this kind of thing? Does the Senator remember how quickly we struck at that and put an end to it?

Mr. HEYBURN. We did not put an end to it, for I received one in to-day's mail.

Mr. HALE. That is another thing from what they had. They had a bureau which was employing men to write articles; and we put an entire stop to it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I remember it very well. I think you will find in the communications accompanying this bill, in some of the reports or statements, that the Forestry Service sent out over 60,000 of this class of communications last year. Those communications are prepared by men who are drawing salaries; they are performing some official duties for the Government, and they are prepared by the Bureau. I have the names of some of the members of that Bureau, but I do not think it necessary to give them. It is sufficient that they have such a bureau. The newspapers are filled with articles, wherever they can induce one to accept them and publish them, which are prepared at the expense of the Government.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming should be adopted, and there should be a prohibition against using this appropriation for the purpose of preparing or publishing articles in newspapers and magazines. The Forestry Service and every Department of the Government is provided by established, recognized law with a proper method, a sufficient method, of coming in contact with the people of this country. I think there should be a prohibition against a single dollar of this appropriation being expended for the purpose of writing these laudatory articles, giving statements as to what splendid speeches were made by this man and that man on behalf of this Service, how they participated in public meetings, and what great public works and good they have performed. I think it is time to stop it, and I would stop it by restoring the words "preparation or;" and, as suggested by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming, I would make it read just as he has indicated:

That no part of this appropriation shall be paid or used for the purpose of paying for, in whole or in part, the preparation or publication of any newspaper or magazine article.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I was about to seek an agreement as to the work on Monday. Does the Senator from Nevada wish to proceed now?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I simply wish to say a word upon this matter.

Mr. WARREN. Well, Mr. President, we have had a long session, and Senators have been very kind to remain. It is perfectly obvious that we can not finish the bill this evening, and I should like to have the Senate cooperate with me and other members of the committee in the further consideration of this bill by meeting at 11 o'clock on Monday morning and proceeding as we did to-day, having the morning hour end at not later than 12 o'clock and that we should finish the bill and vote upon all amendments and the bill itself before adjournment on Monday. I therefore ask unanimous consent to proceed in that manner.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. on Monday.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that motion be put separately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wyoming that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday morning.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming further asks unanimous consent that when the Senate meets on Monday at 11 o'clock, the morning hour shall close not later than 12 o'clock, and that immediately upon the conclusion of the morning business on that day the Senate proceed to the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill, the vote on the bill and amendments to be taken before adjournment on that day.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I think that after a certain hour, say 3 o'clock or 4 o'clock at the latest, speeches should be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. MONEY. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Wyoming that we take the vote at 4 o'clock. That would cut off debate. I think we have had so much debate on this bill that we can get general consent for that arrangement.

Mr. WARREN. The acting chairman is unadvised as to how much debate may be expected, but I should be glad to have such an arrangement made.

Mr. HALE (to Mr. WARREN). Try the proposition to vote at 4 o'clock.

Mr. WARREN. I should be glad to make the request that at 4 o'clock the vote be taken.

Mr. FULTON. I will suggest to the Senator an earlier hour, say 2 o'clock. I think that will give sufficient time in view of the speeches that have been made.

Mr. FORAKER. I will suggest that after 2 o'clock the debate be limited to ten minutes, and that we vote at 4 o'clock on the bill and amendments.

Mr. HALE. That is better.

Mr. FORAKER. Make it not later than 4 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. Not later than 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the agreement as suggested.

The SECRETARY. Unanimous consent is asked that on Monday, May 11, 1908, the morning hour shall close at not later than 12 o'clock meridian; that immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business on said day the Senate proceed to the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill, so called—House bill 19158—and that a vote be taken at 4 o'clock p. m. upon the amendments pending or to be offered and upon the bill itself, debate after 2 o'clock p. m. to proceed under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. FORAKER. The vote to be taken not later than 4 o'clock.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not believe it was the intention to confine the ten-minute debate to the bill itself, because there may be amendments offered.

Mr. HALE. To the bill and amendments.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think it should be on the bill and amendments.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ten-minute rule will apply to the bill and amendments. Is there objection to the agreement as stated? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer a proposed amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire again to give notice that after the Senate has disposed of the pending bill I shall ask that it proceed to the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

CALIFORNIA STREET, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4308) to restore the name of California avenue to that certain street lying and being in the county of Washington and running from Florida avenue to Nineteenth street NW., and now known as V street.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the name of the street lying in the county of Washington, District of Columbia, in the tract of land known as the Commissioners' subdivision of Washington Heights, running from Florida avenue west to Nineteenth street extended, and now called V street, be, and the same shall henceforth be, known as California street. And the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby directed to cause the name of California street, from Florida avenue to Nineteenth street NW., to be placed upon the plats and maps of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to change the name of V street, from Florida avenue to Nineteenth street NW., to California street."

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

Mr. FORAKER. I desire to change the notice I gave this morning with respect to Senate bill 5729, namely, that I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of it after the agricultural appropriation bill is disposed of, subject, of course, to appropriation bills.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

On motion of Mr. CARTER, it was Ordered, That 15,000 copies of S. 6484, a bill to establish postal savings banks for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes, be printed; also that 5,000 copies of Report No. 525, to accompany S. 6484, be printed.

STANDARDS FOR MINERAL-OIL PRODUCTS.

Mr. DICK. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution No. 172, which is on the table.

There being no objection, the resolution submitted by Mr. DICK on April 30, 1908, was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate as to any plans now in progress for international standards for testing mineral-oil products, and as to what legislation is advisable to secure their adoption.

JAMES KANE.

Mr. BULKELEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1159) to correct the military record of James Kane. It is a short bill and will take but a moment.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, after the words "United States," to insert "Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue by virtue of the passage of this act," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to correct the military record of James Kane, late a member of Company C, Fourteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and to issue to said Kane an honorable discharge from the service of the United States: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue by virtue of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BLADENSBURG ROAD, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CARTER. There is a District bill on the Calendar, which I think should be passed. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6580) to amend an act entitled "An act for the widening of Bladensburg road, and for other purposes," approved January 9, 1907.

The Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest that the bill should be amended, in section 2, page 2, line 18, by striking out the word "are" and inserting the word "is."

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; let that amendment be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, section 2, line 18, after the word "same," it is proposed to strike out the word "are" and to insert the word "is," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the limitation of thirty days after the date of dedication within which condemnation proceedings are directed to be instituted for the widening of said Bladensburg road be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF TIMBER ON CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW LANDS.

Mr. OWEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5601) to provide for the sale of timber on the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations for use in coal and asphalt mining operations, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, after the word "operations," to strike out "or such other purposes as he may deem proper," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, under such rules as he may prescribe, to sell, for use in mining operations the timber, whether dead, standing or fallen, or green and growing, on any of the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations segregated and reserved from allotment by written order of the Secretary of the Interior of March 24, 1903, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved on July 1, 1902 (32 Stat. L., p. 641); and the funds accruing from such sale shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 11, 1908, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 9, 1908.

[Continuation of the legislative day of Monday, May 4, 1908.]

The recess having expired, the House, at 11 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m., was called to order by the Speaker.

BOARD OF MANAGERS NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOMES.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing House joint resolution 178.

The question was taken.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yeas and nays.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-seven Members present; not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members; as many as are in favor of agreeing to the motion will, as their names are called, answer "yea;" those opposed will answer "nay;" those present and not voting will answer "present." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 202, nays 5, answered "present" 10, not voting 170, as follows:

For the session:

Mr. BUTLER with Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia.
Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. RIORDAN.
Mr. COUSINS with Mr. FLOOD.
Mr. LORIMER with Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi.
Mr. BRADLEY with Mr. GOULDEN.

For the balance of the day:

Mr. GILHAMS with Mr. GAINES of Tennessee.
Mr. CHAPMAN with Mr. MAYNARD.
Mr. RODENBERG with Mr. MCHENRY.
Mr. BARTHOLDT with Mr. RAINEY.
Mr. WASHBURN with Mr. SHERLEY.
Mr. MURDOCK with Mr. KELIHER.
Mr. ANTHONY with Mr. BOWERS.
Mr. GREENE with Mr. BELL of Georgia.
Mr. CAULFIELD with Mr. CRAVENS.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 202, the nays 5, present 10—a quorum. The Doorkeeper will open the doors; the ayes have it; the motion is agreed to, and the resolution is passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1589) granting an increase of pension to Susan M. Yeoman.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Speaker laid before the House the bill H. R. 20345, an act making appropriation for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House disagree to the Senate amendments en bloc and ask for a conference with the Senate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 193, nays 10, answered "present" 8, not voting 176, as follows:

The SPEAKER announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. LANDIS, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. HOWARD.

DISAPPROVAL OF CERTAIN LAWS OF THE TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. BIRDSALL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution (S. R. 37) disapproving certain laws enacted by the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas on the 11th day of March, 1903, the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico passed an act known as chapter 33 of the acts of the thirty-fifth legislative assembly of New Mexico entitled "An act establishing the law and procedure in certain cases," as follows:

"LAWS OF NEW MEXICO. THIRTY-FIFTH LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY, 1903.

"CHAPTER 33.

"AN ACT ESTABLISHING THE LAW AND PROCEDURE IN CERTAIN CASES.

"H. B. No. 155. Passed over veto March 11, 1903.

"CONTENTS.

"SEC. 1. Civil procedure in personal-injury cases. Persons injured to file affidavit when. Case to be dismissed when. Proviso.

"SEC. 2. On petition district court may issue summons for person injured to appear in court and file complaint. Procedure when person summoned fails to answer.

"SEC. 3. Unlawful to begin action in any other State or Territory. Procedure in case such action has been begun.

"SEC. 4. When action begun in any other State or Territory district court may issue injunction.

"SEC. 5. Provisions of this chapter not to apply in case process can not be served in this Territory.

"SEC. 6. Claims for damages may be compromised.

"Whereas it has become customary for persons claiming damages for personal injuries received in this Territory to institute and maintain suits for the recovery thereof in other States and Trritories, to the increased cost and annoyance and manifest injury and oppression of the business interests of this Territory and the derogation of the dignity of the courts thereof; therefore "Be it enacted by the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico:

"SECTION 1. Hereafter there shall be no civil liability under either the common law or any statute of this Territory on the part of any person or corporation for any personal injuries inflicted or death caused by such person or corporation in this Territory, unless the person claiming damages therefor shall within ninety days after such injuries shall have been inflicted make and serve upon the person or corporation against whom the same is claimed, and at least thirty days before commencing suit to recover judgment therefor, an affidavit which shall be made before some officer within this Territory who is authorized to administer oaths, in which the affiant shall state his name and address, the name of the person receiving such injuries, if such person be other than the affiant, the character and extent of such injuries in so far as the same may be known to affiant, the way or manner in which such injuries were caused in so far as the affiant has any knowledge thereof, and the names and addresses of all witnesses to the happening of the facts or any part thereof causing such injuries as may at such time be known to affiant, and unless the person so claiming such damages shall also commence an action to recover the same within one year after such injuries occur, in the district court of this Territory in and for the county in which such injuries occur, or in and for the county of this Territory where the claimant or person against whom such claim is asserted resides, or in event such claim is asserted against a corporation, in the county in this Territory where such corporation has its principal place of business; and said suit after having been commenced shall not be dismissed by plaintiff unless by written consent of the defendant filed in the case, or for good cause shown to the court; it being hereby expressly provided and understood that such right of action is given only on the understanding that the foregoing conditions precedent are made a part of the law under which right to recover can exist for such injuries, except as herein otherwise provided.

"SEC. 2. Whenever any person or corporation shall file a petition in the district court of this Territory for the county in which said petitioner lives, or, if a corporation, in the district court for the county in which such corporation has its principal place of business, stating in effect that such petitioner is informed and believes that some party named in said petition claims that he is entitled to damages from said petitioner for personal injuries inflicted in this Territory upon the party named in said petition, or for personal injuries inflicted upon or death caused to some other person for which such party claims to have a cause of action against said petitioner, and stating as near as may be the general character of such injuries, and the manner and the date said party claims they were inflicted, and the place where he claims they were inflicted, as near as petitioner knows or is informed as to such facts, and praying that the said party may be required to appear in said court and file therein a statement of his cause of action in the form of a complaint against said petitioner, summons shall issue out of said court and be served and returnable as other processes, commanding and requiring the said party named in said petition to appear in said court and file such statement in the form of a complaint against said petitioner, if he has to make, and upon such complaint being filed by such party as required, the defendant named therein may demur to or answer the same and such further pleading had as the parties may be entitled to, or as may be meet and proper as in other cases of a similar character, and from thence forward such further proceedings shall be had in such cause as in other cases, and the same shall be determined upon its merits and final judgment, subject, however, to appeal or writ of error, shall be rendered therein either for the petitioner named in said complaint or for the adverse party, and if the court finds the petitioner guilty of any of the wrongs, injuries, or trespasses complained of against him in said statement such damages shall be assessed against the said petitioner as the law and the facts may require, in the same manner as though said cause had been instituted by the filing of said statement as a complaint.

"In event said party complained of in said petition, after being duly served with such summons, shall fail or refuse to appear or file his said statement as required herein, judgment shall be rendered by default against him and in favor of the petitioner as in other cases, and thereupon the court shall try and determine the issues raised by such petition, including the question as to whether or not the petitioner is liable to said party on account of any of the matters or things stated in said petition in any sum of money whatsoever, and, if so, in what amount, and final judgment shall be rendered in accordance with the facts and the law, and such judgment as the court may render shall be final and conclusive upon the question of the liability or nonliability of said petitioner to said party, and of the amount of the liability.

"SEC. 3. It shall be unlawful for any person to institute, carry on, or maintain any suit for the recovery of any such damages in any other State or Territory, and upon it being made to appear to the court in which any proceeding has been instituted in this Territory, as herein provided, that any such suit has also been commenced, or is being maintained in any other State or Territory contrary to the intent of this act, it shall be the duty of the court to set down for hearing and try and determine the proceeding so pending in this Territory as expeditiously as possible upon such short notice to the other party thereto or his attorneys as the court may direct; and for the purpose of trying the same said court shall have the power to compel the parties thereto to plead or answer on such short day as it may determine; and in event the same is triable by jury it shall be the duty of the court, upon motion, to change the venue thereof to such county in said district as in the opinion of the court will afford an opportunity for the most speedy hearing; but in event such action is not triable by jury, then the court shall immediately proceed to try and determine the same, giving such reasonable notice as it may determine, to the parties or their attorneys, at any place in the Territory which the court may designate, and witnesses may be compelled by subpœna to attend such place personally, from any part of the Territory, and testify, as at present, at such time and place. The institution of any such suit in any other State or Territory shall be construed by the court as a waiver upon the part of the party so instituting the same of the right of trial by jury in the case pending in the courts of this Territory.

"SEC. 4. Whenever it shall be made to appear to the district court of this Territory for the county in which petitioner or plaintiff lives, by any petition filed under section three hereof, or by a supplemental petition, or by an original complaint filed for that purpose, that petitioner or plaintiff fears or has good reason to fear that any other person is threatening or contemplating instituting suit in some other State or Territory to recover damages against petitioner or plaintiff for personal injuries inflicted or death caused in this Territory, or that he has already instituted and is then maintaining such a suit, it shall be the duty of the court, upon such bond as the court may require being given, to issue its injunction pendente lite restraining such party from instituting or maintaining such suit in any court sitting in any other State or Territory, and, at the final hearing, if such facts are found by the court to be true, the court shall make such injunction perpetual; and at the final hearing in all cases instituted under the provisions of section three hereof the party complained of in the petition shall be perpetually enjoined from further instituting or maintaining any suit or action to recover damages by reason of any of the matters or things set up in said petition.

"SEC. 5. This act shall not apply to cases in which the person or corporation against whom damages for personal injuries are claimed can not be duly served with process in this Territory.

"SEC. 6. Nothing herein contained shall be construed as in any way preventing anyone in this Territory claiming to have a right of action for any such damages from compromising such claim.

"SEC. 7. All acts and parts of acts and laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed, and this act shall be in effect from and after its passage."

Therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That said law of the Territory of New Mexico, as aforesaid, be, and the same is hereby, disapproved and declared null and of no effect.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule a second is ordered, and the gentleman from Iowa is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Texas to twenty minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether, in repealing this act, it will reenact any law of any kind upon the subject? I would like to have the gentleman state whether it does not reenact some law that may be worse than this.

Mr. BIRDSALL. Mr. Speaker, prior to the passage of this act there was no particular legislation in New Mexico governing the procedure in personal-injury cases, so that the passage of this resolution will not reinstate any particular legislation affecting the question.

If attention was paid to the reading of the resolution, it will readily occur to the Members of the House that certainly this is the most remarkable piece of legislation ever enacted. Instead of being entitled "An act to regulate the procedure in certain cases in the Territory of New Mexico," it should have been entitled "An act to prevent the recovery of damages for injuries received in accidents or otherwise, upon railways, within that Territory." This resolution passed the House about a year ago, too late to receive the attention of the Senate. It has now been passed by the Senate and unanimously reported by the Committee on Territories. It is only necessary to call the attention of the House to three or four provisions of the legislation of New Mexico to demonstrate its iniquity.

We are all aware of the fact that in cases of death or accident resulting in death there is no survival of the action unless preserved by the statute of the State. This law undertakes to make as a condition precedent to recovery of damages in any action for personal injury that within ninety days the person injured shall serve upon the offending party an affidavit containing the particulars of the accident, the nature of the injuries received, the witnesses by whom it is expected to be shown, their names and their residences. It further provides that this affidavit must be made within the Territory of New Mexico, before an officer in that Territory qualified to administer oaths. So that if one of you were traveling within the Territory of New Mexico and was injured in a railway accident and returned to your home, you would have to again go to the Territory of New Mexico and swear to this affidavit.

It further limits the recovery in actions of this nature, fixes the period of limitation at one year, and that is a shorter period than that prescribed by any statute that I know of within any State or Territory in the United States.

It contains another peculiar provision, that in case the railroad company, or any person who has an idea that you may have an action against them for personal injury, they may compel you to come into court upon notice, and bring your suit, file your declaration, and proceed against them. This is an innovation upon the law of every State and every Territory and every nation, as far as I know, the only exception being the old action termed "quietus tenet," an action to quiet title.

I know of no State or Territory in the Union that has a law whereby you may bring a person into court to sue you, and if you fail to appear, the parties get what is termed a judgment of nonliability against you, or if the court adjudicates that you have no cause of action against them.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BIRDSALL. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the railroad company, the defendant in a personal-injury case, the company that inflicted the injury, become the plaintiff in this peculiar and extraordinary proceeding?

Mr. BIRDSALL. It does.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And recover the judgment against the person injured?

Mr. BIRDSALL. Against the party, of what is termed nonliability. [Laughter.] That seems a little peculiar, but the Texas court of appeals had this question before it——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am somewhat familiar with the statute. There is a bill pending now on the Calendar from the Committee on Territories in the House disapproving of this same law.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is this bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This is a Senate resolution.

Mr. BIRDSALL. It has passed the Senate and is reported from the Committee on Territories.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We passed the same bill through the last Congress.

Mr. BIRDSALL. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And then reported one in this.

Mr. BIRDSALL. I say this is a peculiar proposition; but the circuit court of appeals had the question before it in a suit brought in the State of Texas after a New Mexico court had declared a judgment of nonliability, and the court of appeals of Texas said that while this was a very peculiar statute, that it was unique in its character and its purpose, yet they were not authorized to say that it is not such as the Territory of New Mexico had the power to pass, and it was for that Territory to determine; and that court held that it was a bar to a suit brought against a railroad company in the State of Texas.

The whole purpose of this statute was to compel the bringing of all actions of this character which are of a transitory nature, so recognized by all the courts of the United States, within the Territory of New Mexico, and to compel them to be brought either in the county where the action occurred or at the principal place of business of the railway company. So that a citizen of New Mexico would have to travel perhaps two or three hundred miles in order to bring his suit. Another peculiar provision is this: It provides that such action shall not be maintained in any other court, State, or Territory, outside of the Territory of New Mexico, and if the railroad company or any person has reason to believe that you intend to bring such a suit elsewhere than in the Territory of New Mexico, the bill provides that you may be enjoined from bringing it. [Laughter.] An injunction will be granted against you, and notwithstanding that, if you proceed in a foreign jurisdiction with your suit, this act provides that the court shall rush the injunction suit in the Territory of New Mexico, and if there does not happen to be a jury in the county where the action is pending, it shall transfer it to some other county in the Territory where there is a jury, so that immediate trial may be had in order that you may be effectually and thoroughly enjoined.

Mr. BUTLER. Where was this act passed—in a railroad office?

Mr. BIRDSALL. It was born in iniquity. I do not know how it was passed.

Mr. DRISCOLL. This act was passed in 1903?

Mr. BIRDSALL. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Has it been in force ever since in the Territory of New Mexico?

Mr. BIRDSALL. It has been in force in the Territory of New Mexico, and it has not only applied to personal-injury cases against railroad companies, but has been held to apply between individuals and to all classes of cases, even down to libel and slander.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Suppose this is annulled by the action of Congress; what would be the legal status of people to whom a cause of action arose during those five years? Can we put them back into the same legal status they would have been in if this law had not been enacted?

Mr. BIRDSALL. I do not think so. From my investigation I am satisfied that this is not retroactive.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does the gentleman think that the rights that would inure to them under the common law of negligence will all be renewed?

Mr. BIRDSALL. I do not think so.

Mr. DRISCOLL. If this is repealed or declared void?

Mr. BIRDSALL. I do not think so. I think they will be governed by the statute of the Territory of New Mexico, infamous as it is, until this resolution passes. In other words, the law of a Territory is the law until it is disapproved by Congress, and it is only affected by an act of disapproval here, so it could not have any retroactive force.

Mr. DRISCOLL. So that by no action on our part can the causes of action be revised——

Mr. BIRDSALL. I do not know of any.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Which have been outlawed or which have been lost by force of this law, which this resolution is intended to repeal.

Mr. BIRDSALL. I do not think so. I am inclined to think it takes effect only from the passage of a resolution here.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa if this law is repealed what law will cover this class of cases in New Mexico?

Mr. BIRDSALL. The common law.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I thought possibly there was some act equally objectionable to this that might be restored. If we repeal this act, then, the heirs of those killed would have no right of action. I know no way of forcing the legislature of New Mexico to pass a law.

Mr. BIRDSALL. I do not see that we can help that proposition.

Mr. PAYNE. Why can not the Congress of the United States pass a reasonable statute upon this subject, and thus prevent the legislature of New Mexico from inaugurating any other—I was going to say fool legislation—any other legislation on this subject of a character similar to this?

Mr. BIRDSALL. Well, there is no doubt about the power of Congress to legislate for the Territory, I will say to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Do not you think Congress ought to do this? If you pass this resolution and annul this statute, what warrant of authority have you that the legislature will not get together on the first opportunity and repass this statute?

Mr. BIRDSALL. I will say to the gentleman that unless there is some change in conditions in the Territory of New Mexico it will be a very wise thing to do.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope the gentleman and the Committee on the Judiciary will see to that.

Mr. CHANEY. Ought not there to be some provision for the cases which will be interfered with if we repeal this statute by this resolution?

Mr. BIRDSALL. I am satisfied there is no way of providing, I will say to the gentleman from Indiana, to make this resolution or action of ours retroactive so as to save any cases that have been lost under this statute.

Mr. CHANEY. There will naturally be some worthy cases——

Mr. BIRDSALL. There may be some cases yet in existence within the ninety days, so they would be preserved, but any case that has been lost by virtue of this statute is gone.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Would not the rights of the people under the common law survive if this is declared void?

Mr. BIRDSALL. I hope so, but I am inclined to think not, I will say to the gentleman from New York. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, my object in demanding a second was that we might have a full explanation in regard to this statute passed by the legislature of New Mexico. The gentleman from Iowa is an able lawyer and has very fully and satisfactorily explained it. I am thoroughly satisfied that Congress should pass this joint resolution. We not only have the power to annul a law enacted by a Territorial legislature, but in a case like this it becomes the duty of Congress to do so. Glancing at some of the provisions of this law hastily as it has been possible for me to do so, I believe with the gentleman from Iowa that the statute should be properly characterized as an infamous one. It is true that if we annul the statute we are then remitted to common-law rights and remedies in the Territory of New Mexico, except where the employers' liability bill may apply in cases coming under its provisions. Understanding the statute in the light above indicated, I shall cast my vote in favor of the joint resolution. I yield ten minutes time to the gentleman from Porto Rico [Mr. LARRINAGA]. [Applause.]

Mr. LARRINAGA. Mr. Speaker, I want to avail myself of the courtesy of the gentleman from Texas to make a few remarks about the subject that was treated here yesterday. In the course of the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi he spoke about the discontent growing in Porto Rico. It is a fact, Mr. Speaker—unfortunately a fact—that in spite of all the efforts of the best and most patriotic Porto Ricans, a sentiment of discontent still pervades the island. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] was right, and when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS] said that that was due to the peculiar character of the Porto Ricans it in some way reflected on the people of Porto Rico, in my opinion, although I believe, Mr. Speaker, that every race and every people on earth have their peculiarities. In fact, I did not take it as a reflection on my people, but I say, Mr. Speaker, let no gentleman in this House, or outside of this House, speak of the cause of the discontent on such a flimsy basis as a peculiarity of character of our people, when every people of every race has its own peculiarities.

I shall call the attention, Mr. Speaker, of every fair-minded man to the act passed by the Fifty-sixth Congress by which the rights and the liberties of our people were killed. The act of April 12, 1900, is the leaden block that closed the sepulcher where the liberties and rights of a million freemen are buried; and why, Mr. Speaker, should we be obliged every day to see in the press, and even on the floor of this House, to hear such reflections upon the people of Porto Rico, perhaps only to justify the Government that this Congress has imposed upon us, for this is adding insult to injustice. Any fair-minded man, Mr. Speaker, has but to take the Foraker Act and begin with the first section. And what does he find there? He finds, Mr. Speaker, that the citizenship of Porto Rico is done away with, and we are made citizens of Porto Rico. We think, Mr. Speaker, that nature had done that for us long ago.

Coming to the question of political rights, what do you find there in that act? Instead of the self-government that the people of Porto Rico had, you will find that it has practically ceased; the executive is mixed with the legislative, and officers that are appointed by the Executive go down there to make the laws for a people whose customs they do not know; for a people whose faces they have never seen before in their life, and for a people whose laws and language they do not know. Mr. Speaker, that is practically the government of Porto Rico. That house of delegates does not amount to anything. It has been honestly said by some member of the executive council, and it is so, that they are mere figureheads. No law can be passed that those six gentleman do not approve of. Those six gentlemen go there and make our laws, they vote our taxes, they collect them by the employees they appoint, and they spend them through those same people. Is it strange, Mr. Speaker, that discontent, after eight years of suffering this tyranny, should be spreading through the islands?

Mr. Speaker, I have but little time to go over the whole subject. It would take many hours to slightly touch the main points I could treat here, but I will now get to a point of which a good deal is made. Let us come to the economic part of that act. What does it provide for the people of Porto Rico? It provides that the fiscal laws of the United States shall be applied. They were applied, and ruined the country, because no provision was made to protect our main industry, the industry of the poor man, the coffee industry. The Fifty-sixth Congress, a Congress committed to protection, like every Congress that has succeeded it, never thought for a moment of protecting the production of our poor people. And there you are. One of the best features of our people has disappeared. Property was quite equally distributed in the coffee districts, and every poor man had his tract of land, where he cultivated his coffee. What has become of that land? It has passed into the hands of the rich. The way is therefore paved for the third trust. We have the sugar trust and the tobacco trust, and pretty soon we will have the coffee trust, when prices rise and this Congress votes protection for Porto Rico coffee.

I am sorry to have to bring before the House these facts. Mr. Speaker, for years among my people I made a gospel of American principles and taught them to love and revere the American people. And they sent me here because they believed in me. They did not send one of the great men, one of their brilliant orators, here. They wanted a man who had faith in his work, and they trusted me. They sent me here to make good, so to speak.

What other provision that will not breed discontent would anyone find in that Foraker Act when he goes over it? He finds an exchange of our currency made in a day from six and a quarter millions to less than four millions. Think of that, Mr. Speaker! When Spain exchanged our Mexican dollars, she charged to the people of Porto Rico 5 per cent and gave us the Spanish dollar. Instead of our 6,000,000 of pesos, what does the Foraker Act give us? It gave us less than four millions in silver dollars and silver certificates, and as we had had a very bad crop the year before and were owing more than a million to the United States, we received in cash less than three millions.

Just think of that, gentlemen, in this country, having in one day reduced its circulating medium to one-third of what it is now. What would happen in the streets in every city in the United States? Why were we made to suffer so much in the first four years, for, to be honest, Mr. Speaker, those times have passed away to some extent, and we are prospering now. Porto Rico is coming ahead financially. I hear every day in the political campaign here, "We have made Porto Rico prosperous." I wish you had. Then no discontent would exist, and perhaps I could be looked upon by my countrymen with more kind regard. I wish you had made Porto Rico happy, but you have not, Mr. Speaker. When a cyclone strikes the island, and a cyclone comes about once in twenty years, we always come to the rescue, and it is a matter of one crop. But this time there were those six men there. When the last cyclone struck the island, we could not come to the rescue and help those that had suffered, and so to this day, day by day, hundreds and hundreds of small properties have been sold.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Porto Rico, and reserve three minutes.

Mr. LARRINAGA. Mr. Speaker, I was telling the House that whenever a cyclone came to the island it was a matter of one crop ruined. The people came to the help of those who had suffered, and next year we went right ahead. We tried to do it when the last cyclone came, but the executive council would not tolerate it. It seemed that it was easier to collect the taxes from one rich man than from a hundred poor men. All mortgages were foreclosed, and the small properties passed into the hands of the banks and other institutions of credit. You will find in Porto Rico that banking institutions and commercial houses and financiers of all kinds hold from thirty to forty and even fifty different coffee properties. Not only that; but as I said, the poor men could not pay their taxes, and their properties were sold day after day by the treasurer of Porto Rico. I challenge contradiction on every fact I mention here, and I want anybody who thinks I am exaggerating to stand up and give me his argument.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LARRINAGA. Certainly.

Mr. PARSONS. As I understand the gentleman, he was alluding to the failure of the executive council to approve an act passed by the lower branch of the legislative body to authorize the issuance of ten millions in bonds?

Mr. LARRINAGA. Five millions. There were different projects presented at different times, and I had the honor of being the author of one of them.

Mr. PARSONS. There was to be an issuance of $5,000,000 in bonds, proposed to be loaned the coffee planters whose trees had been killed by storms. Was not that correct?

Mr. LARRINAGA. To every planter who had enough responsibility left in his property to have some money. Of course the people of Porto Rico were not to lose a cent.

Mr. CHANEY. It was a loan?

Mr. LARRINAGA. Yes, sir.

Mr. PARSONS. I also understood the gentleman to argue that unless a tariff was put on coffee the coffee crop could not be made profitable?

Mr. LARRINAGA. Not at all.

Mr. PARSONS. Does not the gentleman contend that a tariff on coffee is necessary in order to grow a coffee crop there?

Mr. LARRINAGA. We wished to help the planters.

Mr. PARSONS. Then the proposition of the lower house in Porto Rico was that they should create a bond issue of $5,000,000, to be loaned to the people whose crops can not be profitable unless the United States passes a tariff bill putting a duty on their coffee?

Mr. LARRINAGA. Not at all. The gentleman from New York came to a very wrong conclusion. [Applause.] My proposition is this——

Mr. PARSONS. I will be very glad if the gentleman will explain my error, because in reading the reports that have been submitted that is the only conclusion I have been able to come to.

Mr. LARRINAGA. Well, I will explain the proposition to the gentleman from New York. It is a very simple one. The loans were to be made to people who had sufficient property left in their coffee plantations to secure some money to fix them. The money was to be loaned to the poor people who had their buildings blown down by cyclone; to those who had the large shade trees thrown on the coffee trees and needed money to remove them and clear their plantations.

The loan was to be made on thirty years' time, at 6 per cent interest, so as to help those people and prevent them from having their property sold to pay their debts or their taxes, and so forth. The provisions of the bill were that not more than 40 per cent of the appraised value of the property should be loaned to a man. It was perfectly secure. The people of Porto Rico could not have lost a single cent.

Now, the tariff on coffee is a different proposition. The people of Porto Rico thought that as Congress was committed to protection, they were to be given a little protection. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] We hear so much said about a "square deal," Mr. Speaker, that we believed we were justified in assuming that we would get it. [Great laughter.] We are a very credulous people [renewed laughter]; one of the peculiarities of our character, Mr. Speaker [renewed laughter], and that is the reason why we sometimes get the worst end of it. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. CHANEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, give him more time.

Mr. CHANEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have ten minutes more.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have only three minutes remaining, and I desire to retain that much; but, of course, I have no objection to the gentleman having ten minutes, or as much more as the House will give him.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. BUTLER. Why not ask how much time he wants?

Mr. LARRINAGA. I will thank you for all the time the House will give. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Porto Rico be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I object.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I ask that the gentleman be granted ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Porto Rico be extended ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think the rules of the House ought to be observed, and I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] has three minutes and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIRDSALL] has five minutes.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ADAIR. Was permission granted to the gentleman to extend his remarks in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was not.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Since the last visit I made to Porto Rico, I have kept up a correspondence with several warm friends I made while there; and just the other day I received a letter from one of them, a man of fine character and great intelligence, a gentleman devoted patriotically to the interests of Porto Rico. I will not disclose his name, but there can be no objection to my reading a part of a letter received from him within the month. You will notice that while he writes very well, he at times uses words somewhat curiously; but, upon the whole, I think he makes himself very clearly understood. It is as follows:

Returning to our correspondence about the unreasonably disgusted people of this island of Porto Rico with the American Government, I am prone to believe that it is no one's fault but the political leaders, who in their speeches create sometimes bitterness against the American Government generally, among the ignorant people of this island. All these leaders say that we should be granted the self-government. I do not myself amount to much, but in my humble opinion I say to you frankly that they are mistaken, for we are not prepared for self-government yet, and many a year shall have to pass before we are prepared to rule ourselves. Porto Rico has never been so smartly, well, and freely ruled as it is now, and I feel sure that when we are indeed prepared for self-government the United States will grant us that privilege, but in the meantime we really do not deserve it.

Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, no one can visit that beautiful island and see its present prosperity and the abounding happiness of the people without feeling impressed with the idea——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Excuse me. I have but five minutes.

Mr. LARRINAGA. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No; I beg your pardon. I should be glad to answer all questions if I had time. No one can go there without becoming profoundly interested in that island. I did become interested, and I heartily approve of the appeal of the Commissioner for encouragement to the coffee crop of the island. I think the people there ought to have it. It is essentially the poor man's crop.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No; I beg your pardon, but I can not. I am also in favor of citizenship for these people, but under certain conditions. I have introduced a bill, one section of which I should like to read; because, while I am not in favor of wholesale citizenship conferred upon all the people of the island without any individual action on their part, I am in favor of citizenship to those who want it, who ask for it, and who are willing to accept it under proper conditions.

I have prepared and introduced a bill, of which I will read the first section:

Be it enacted etc., That any male person over the age of 21 years, actually resident in the island of Porto Rico, and an elector of Porto Rico under the laws thereof, may, upon his own motion, become a naturalized citizen of the United States by complying with the following forms and conditions:

First. He shall appear in person before the municipal judge of that municipality and judicial district within the island of Porto Rico wherein he may reside and file a declaration of his desire to become a citizen of the United States.

Second. Having filed such declaration, he shall, within not less than thirty and not more than sixty days thereafter, appear again in person before such municipal judge and take and subscribe an oath to support, maintain, and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States; whereupon a certificate of citizenship shall be issued to him by said municipal judge and he shall thereupon become a citizen of the United States, and his name and residence shall be entered by said municipal judge upon a register to be kept by him for that purpose.

The other sections provide for some details, and the last section provides that on and after a certain date in the future no one not a citizen of the United States can hold office in Porto Rico.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to have the three minutes that the gentleman from Texas has reserved, if he will be kind enough to give that time to me.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I would gladly yield to the gentleman, but I have already promised the time.

Mr. Speaker, I see that the report accompanying the joint resolution has an explanation, and I ask unanimous consent that the report be inserted in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. NEEDHAM). The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the report be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the report (by Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan):

[To accompany S. R. 37.]

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 37) for the disapproval of certain laws of the Territory of New Mexico, having had the same under consideration, report it back with the recommendation that it do pass.

A House joint resolution (H. J. Res. No. 94) identical with the Senate resolution accompanying this report was reported to the House by the Committee on the Territories February 21, 1908. That report states the reasons assigned by the committee for favorable consideration of the resolution, and is as follows:

"The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred the joint resolution H. J. Res. 94, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

"This legislation of New Mexico, to say the least, is unique and demonstrates the wisdom of the law giving Congress absolute control over the legislation of the Territories.

"It is entitled 'An act establishing the law and procedure in certain cases.' In the judgment of the committee the title should be 'An act to prevent persons receiving injuries through the carelessness of railroads and other corporations in the Territory of New Mexico from recovering any damages therefor.'

"In passing, the committee would say that the act did not commend itself to the governor of New Mexico, and was promptly vetoed by him, yet the legislature, for some cause which may be imagined, readily passed it over his veto.

"The first section says there shall be no civil liability either at common law or under the statute on the part of any person or corporation for any personal injuries inflicted or death caused by such person or corporation in the Territory unless the person claiming damages shall within ninety days after such injuries serve upon the person or corporation against whom it is claimed, and at least thirty days before the commencement of suit, an affidavit made before some person authorized to administer oaths, giving the name of the person receiving the injuries if the person be other than the affiant, the character and the extent of the injuries, the manner in which they were caused, the names and addresses of all witnesses, and the facts or any part thereof relating to such injuries, and shall also commence his action within one year after the injuries occurred in the district court in the county in which they occur or where the defendant resides, said action not to be dismissed or discontinued except by consent of the defendant, and all the foregoing conditions are made a condition precedent upon which the right to recover for such injuries can exist, except as provided in section 2.

"The second section permits the person or corporation in the district to file a petition in the district court in the county where the petitioner lives stating that he is informed that some one claims damages for personal injuries or both, setting forth as near as he can the manner in which the claim arose, asking that the party injured be required to appear in said court and file a statement of his cause of action against such petitioner in the form of a complaint, to which the petitioner may demur or answer, when the matter shall proceed to trial, and damages, if any are awarded, shall be assessed as the law and facts may require, subject to the right of having the matter reviewed on writ of error; but in case the party summoned does not appear, the court shall proceed to try and determine the whole matter ex parte.

"The third section prohibits a person injured in that Territory to bring any action or maintain any suit in any other State or Territory therefor; and if anybody has done it, it shall be the duty of the court in the Territory to set down for hearing and try and determine the question as expeditiously as possible and on short notice to the other party, and gives the court power to compel the parties to appear and plead; and in case it is not triable by jury, the courts shall proceed at once to try and determine the same, and providing also that the bringing of a suit in any other State or Territory shall be construed by the court as a waiver on the right of the person so bringing it to have a trial by jury in the courts of the Territory.

"Section 4 authorizes the court to issue an injunction prohibiting the party from prosecuting his suit in any other State or Territory.

"Section 5 makes these conditions and limitations apply to all cases in which damages for personal injuries are claimed.

"Section 6 does, however, concede the right of parties to compromise the claim.

"It seems to the committee that this act throws so many obstacles around the maintenance of an action for personal injuries as to be in many cases a virtual denial of justice and right and that it ought to be expunged from the statutes of New Mexico.

"It should be stated that recently the United States district court in Colorado held the act in question to be unconstitutional.

"One suit was brought in the State of Texas in which a judgment of nonliability had been ordered by a court in the Territory of New Mexico under this act, and the court in Texas said that while it was a very peculiar provision, such as they had never heard or known of in jurisprudence, yet they did not know any reason why there was not a legal right of the legislature to provide that action of nonliability, and declined to pass on the constitutionality of the law in a sister State or Territory."

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, this matter has been under consideration before the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not violate any secrets of that committee or transgress the rules of the House when I say that, in my opinion, this measure which is now before the House ought to pass, and met with the entire approval of the membership of that committee. This particular resolution was not before the Committee on the Judiciary, but there was and is pending before the committee a bill looking to the appointment of another judge for the Territory of New Mexico, and the evidence submitted to the committee showed that it was necessary to have another judge in that Territory for the due and proper administration of public justice.

But I may say to this House that so outrageous were the provisions of this Territorial law embodied in this resolution that when it was called to the attention of the committee at the time they had this bill for the extra judge under consideration that committee had determined to attach to the bill providing for that judge a provision annulling this law. It was, however, suggested that the House would probably pass this joint resolution and make it, therefore, unnecessary to attach an annulling provision to the bill for the separate judge.

I want to say that no lawyer, no laymen here, can read this law which it is proposed to repeal by this joint resolution without being horrified by its outrages. It was passed at the instance of the railroads out there in the Territory of New Mexico, where the railroads tyrannize over these people under this Territorial law, and where the people are deprived of public justice, and this House should pass this resolution, and that speedily. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in order to save the time I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 193, answered "present" 12, not voting 183, as follows:

CHILD LABOR IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 4812) to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert in lieu thereof the following, which I send to the desk and ask to have read, to suspend the rules, and pass the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16063) to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That no child under 14 years of age shall be employed, permitted, or suffered to work in the District of Columbia in any factory, workshop, mercantile establishment, store, business office, telegraph or telephone office, restaurant, hotel, apartment house, club, theater, bowling alley, laundry, boot-black stand, or in the distribution or transmission of merchandise or messages. No such child shall be employed in any work performed for wages or other compensation, to whomsoever payable, during the hours when the public schools of the District of Columbia are in session, nor before the hour of 8 o'clock in the morning or after the hour of 7 o'clock in the evening.

SEC. 2. That no child under 16 years of age shall be employed, permitted, or suffered to work in the District of Columbia in any of the establishments named in section 1, unless the person or corporation employing him procures and keeps on file and accessible to the inspectors authorized by this act and the truant officers of the District of Columbia an age and schooling certificate and keeps two complete lists of all such children employed therein, one on file and one conspicuously posted near the principal entrance of the building in which such children are employed.

SEC. 3. That an age and schooling certificate shall be approved only by the superintendent of public schools or by a person authorized by him in writing, who shall have authority to administer the oath provided for therein, but no fee shall be charged therefor.

SEC. 4. That an age and schooling certificate shall not be approved unless satisfactory evidence is furnished by duly attested transcript of the certificate of birth or baptism of such child, or other religious record, or the register of birth or the affidavit of the parent or guardian or custodian of a child, which affidavit shall be required, however, only in case such last-mentioned transcript of the certificate of birth be not procured and filed, showing the place and date of birth of such child, which affidavit must be taken before the officer issuing the employment certificate, who is hereby authorized and required to administer such oath, and who shall not demand or receive a fee therefor.

SEC. 5. That the age and schooling certificate of a child under 16 years of age shall be in the following form:

AGE AND SCHOOLING CERTIFICATE.

This certifies that I am the (father, mother, guardian, or custodian) of (name of child) ——— ———, and that (he or she) was born at (name of town or city) ——— in the county (name of county, if known) ——— and State (or country) ——— on the (day and year of birth) ——— and is now (number of years and months) ——— old.

Signature of (father, mother, guardian, or custodian).

(Date.)

There personally appeared before me the above-named (name of person signing) ——— ——— and made oath that the foregoing certificate by (him or her) signed is true to the best of (his or her) knowledge and belief. I hereby approve the foregoing certificate of (name of child) ——— ———; complexion (fair or dark), ———; hair (color), ———, having no sufficient reason to doubt that (he or she) is of the age therein certified. I hereby certify that (he or she) can read at sight and can write legibly simple sentences in the English language, and that (he or she) has reached the normal development of a child of (his or her) age, and is in sound health and is physically able to perform the work which (he or she) intends to do, and that (he or she) has regularly attended the public schools, or a school equivalent thereto, for not less than one hundred and thirty days during the school year previous to applying for such school record, or during the year previous to applying for such school record, and has received during such period instruction in reading, spelling, writing, and arithmetic.

This certificate belongs to (name of child in whose behalf it is drawn) ——— ——— and is to be surrendered to (him or her) whenever (he or she) leaves the service of the corporation or employer holding the same, but if not claimed by said child within thirty days from such time it shall be returned to the superintendent of schools.

(Signature of person authorized to approve and sign, with official character of authority.)

A duplicate of each age and schooling certificate shall be filed out and kept on file by the superintendent of public schools. Any explanatory matter may be printed with such certificate, in the discretion of said superintendent.

SEC. 6. That whoever employs a child under 16 years of age, and whoever having under his control a child under such age permits such child to be employed in violation of sections 1, 2, 8, or 9 of this act shall, for such offense, be fined not more than $50; and whoever continues to employ any child in violation of any of said sections of this act, after being notified by an inspector authorized by this act, or a truant officer of the District of Columbia, shall for every day thereafter that such employment continues be fined not more than $20. A failure to produce to an inspector authorized by this act, or a truant officer of the District of Columbia, any age or schooling certificate or list required by this act shall be prima facie evidence of illegal employment of any person whose age and schooling certificate is not produced or whose name is not listed. Any corporation or employer retaining any age and schooling certificate in violation of section 5 of this act shall be fined not more than $20. Every person authorized to sign the certificate prescribed by section 5 of this act who knowingly certifies to any materially false statement therein shall be fined not more than $50.

SEC. 7. That inspectors authorized by this act and the truant officers of the District of Columbia shall visit the establishments named in section 1 and ascertain whether any minors are employed therein contrary to the provisions of this act, and they shall report any cases of such illegal employment to the superintendent of public schools and the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia. Inspectors authorized by this act and the truant officers of the District of Columbia shall require that the age and schooling certificates and lists provided for in this act of minors employed in the establishments named in section 1 shall be produced for their inspection.

SEC. 8. That no minor under 16 years of age shall be employed, permitted, or suffered to work in any of the establishments named in section 1 more than eight hours in any one day, or before the hour of 6 o'clock a. m., or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m., and in no case shall the number of hours exceed forty-eight in a week.

SEC. 9. That every employer shall post in a conspicuous place in every room where such persons are employed a printed notice, stating the number of hours required of them on each day of the week, the hours of commencing and stopping work, and the hours when the time or times allowed for dinner or for other meals begin and end. The printed form of such notice shall be furnished by the inspectors authorized by this act and the truant officers of the District of Columbia, and the employment of any such person for a longer time in any day than that so stated shall be deemed a violation of this section.

SEC. 10. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to appoint two inspectors to carry out the purpose of this act, at a compensation not exceeding $1,200 each per annum.

SEC. 11. That no male child under 10, and no girl under 16 years of age shall exercise the trade of bootblacking, or sell or expose or offer for sale any newspapers, magazines, periodicals, or goods, wares, or merchandise of any description whatsoever, upon the streets, roads, or highways, or in any public place within the District of Columbia.

SEC. 12. That from and after July 1, 1908, no male child under 16 years shall exercise the trade of bootblacking or sell or expose or offer for sale any newspapers, magazines, periodicals or goods, ware or merchandise of any description whatsoever upon the streets, roads, or highways, or in any public place within the District of Columbia unless a permit and badge as hereinafter provided shall have been issued to him by the superintendent of public schools of the District of Columbia, or by a person authorized by him in writing for that purpose upon the application of the parent, guardian, or other person having the custody of the child desiring such permit and badge, or in case said child has no parent, guardian, or custodian, then on the application of his next friend, being an adult.

SEC. 13. That such permit and badge shall be issued free of charge to the applicant, but shall not be issued until an age and schooling certificate shall have been issued as provided in this act.

SEC. 14. That such permit shall state the date and place of birth of the child, the name and address of its parent, guardian, custodian, or next friend, as the case may be, and describe the color of hair and eyes, the height and weight, and any distinguishing facial mark of such child, and shall further state that the age and schooling certificate has been duly examined and filed, and that the child named in such permit has appeared before the officer issuing the permit. The badge furnished by the officer issuing the permit shall bear on its face a number corresponding to the number of the permit and the name of the child. Every such permit, and every such badge on its reverse side, shall be signed in the presence of the officer issuing the same by the child in whose name it is issued. The badge provided for herein shall be worn conspicuously at all times by such child while so working, and all such permits and badges shall expire annually on the 1st day of January. The color of the badge shall be changed each year. No child to whom such permit and badge are issued shall transfer the same to any other person, nor be engaged in the District of Columbia in any of the trades or occupations mentioned in this section without having conspicuously upon his person such badge, and he shall exhibit the same upon demand to any police or truant officer or to the inspectors in this act provided for.

SEC. 15. That no child to whom a permit and badge are issued as provided for in the preceding sections shall sell or expose or offer for sale any newspapers, magazines, or periodicals after 10 o'clock in the evening or before 6 o'clock in the morning.

SEC. 16. That nothing in this act contained shall apply to the employment of any child in a theatrical exhibition, provided the written consent of one of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia is first obtained. Such consent shall specify the name of the child, its age, the names and residence of its parents or guardians, together with the place and character of the exhibition.

SEC. 17. That the juvenile court of the District of Columbia is hereby given jurisdiction in all cases arising under this act.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, a second is ordered. The gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to twenty minutes.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, the first part of the House bill 16063, which has been read and offered as a substitute for the Senate bill, with the exception that 14 years is substituted in place of 12 years, is largely similar to the bill passed by the Senate. The bill as it has passed the Committee on the District of Columbia has been made much more comprehensive than the Senate bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This bill contains 14 years instead of 12 years.

Mr. OLCOTT. Fourteen years instead of 12 years, and, as I say, the bill itself has been made much more comprehensive, in that it makes provision for newsboys and venders of such merchandise as shoe laces and things of that kind, allowing them, after securing a permit and badge from the superintendent of public instruction, to sell, in certain hours, newspapers, but they must be provided with the badge and the permit by the superintendent. After a child becomes 10 years of age he can, under certain circumstances, sell newspapers and merchandise in the streets.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But not during school hours?

Mr. OLCOTT. Not during school hours. In the summary of the provisions of the act as contained in the report we state that no child under 14 years of age is to work in a factory or store or anywhere else during public school hours or before 8 o'clock a. m. or after 7 o'clock p. m., and that between the years of 14 and 16 children employed in any factory or shop must secure schooling certificates, stating that they have attended school and have been instructed in rudimentary subjects for one hundred and thirty days during the previous school year. No child under 16 years of age is to work more than eight hours in a day or forty-eight hours in one week. Then comes the provision in regard to newspaper venders, that no boy under 10 or girl under 16 shall sell newspapers or other merchandise or engage in bootblacking on the streets; and all boys under 16 are required to obtain a permit and badge to pursue these occupations.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I notice that newsboys are required, if they come under the bill as to age, to have a badge.

Mr. OLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. There is not anything in this bill, is there, that makes it unlawful for one newsboy to transfer that badge to somebody else.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. OLCOTT. Yes; the name of the child must be inscribed on the badge.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that the name must be, and the color of the eyes, and so forth, but there ought to be some provision, I should think, notwithstanding that, to safeguard against the transfer of badges.

Mr. OLCOTT. There is a provision. There is no penalty attached. There is a provision on page 8 that no child to whom such a badge is issued shall transfer it to any other person.

Mr. NORRIS. But that has no penalty clause.

Mr. OLCOTT. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the gentleman think that the section would be effective without a penalty attached to it.

Mr. OLCOTT. I think so. The matter is in charge of the superintendent of public instruction, and the truant officers and inspectors provided for under this bill can arrest the child and examine the permit and make inquiries.

Mr. KAHN. A description of the child is on the badge anyway.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that. It is proper, so far as the description is concerned, but unless there is some penalty—and I think if there is any it ought to be light—there would be no reason why they could not transfer the badges.

Mr. KAHN. This provision is very similar to the provision of the New York law. Of course in the city of New York there are hundreds of these boys on the streets where there are probably tens here, and the law is identical with the New York law. There is no trouble there at all in enforcing this provision of the law.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course the only object that I have is that I would like to have the law efficient, and if the experience has shown that it is efficient there——

Mr. OLCOTT. That has been the experience in New York City, and the experience there has shown that the power to withhold the issuance of a badge or permit has worked to such an extent that it is not necessary to impose a penalty.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, the gentleman thinks this particular reason should be used for the withholding of the badge?

Mr. OLCOTT. Oh, I think there is no doubt about it at all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion——

Mr. OLCOTT. He must secure a badge, and it is in the discretion of the superintendent whether the badge is issued or not, and it must be renewed once a year. The worst that might happen would be that some boy unauthorized might sell newspapers for a little while, but I think with the truant officers and inspectors and superintendent of schools, and in view of the fact that the entire jurisdiction is put in the juvenile court, the difficulty which the gentleman suggests will not be a serious one.

Mr. BOUTELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is there any provision in this bill as to who pays for these badges?

Mr. OLCOTT. The badges are to be given free. There is no charge for them nor for school certificates or permits.

Mr. BOUTELL. I think that is an essential provision, and I am very glad it is in the bill.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. One suggestion I want to make to the gentleman from New York, and that is to take into consideration when the bill goes to conference, as doubtless it will, the propriety of inserting in the bill a penalty for the revocation of the permit and that possibly another penalty, not upon the child—I do not think children ought to be made criminals at all——

Mr. OLCOTT. That is the feeling the committee had when we considered that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER (continuing). Possibly a penalty upon the parent or guardian or any person who furnishes papers to a child who has not a permit to sell newspapers—for instance, to a newsboy. A penalty might be imposed upon the publisher or newsdealer who furnishes the papers to a boy who has not complied with the law. Then there should be a penalty for revoking a permit and then a penalty upon anyone who furnishes papers to one who has not a permit. I think perhaps that might strengthen that feature of it.

Mr. OLCOTT. I want to say to the gentleman I think that is entirely covered. No child can be employed under 14.

These provisions in regard to children 10 years old are simply for those little fellows in business for themselves. I will be very glad, however, to take the matter under consideration when it comes to the matter of a conference.

Mr. WALDO. I would like to ask the gentleman, Do I understand the age limit has been changed from 12 to 14?

Mr. OLCOTT. To 14; as it was reported it was 14.

Mr. WALDO. That is the amendment the gentleman offered with the bill?

Mr. OLCOTT. Oh, yes; it is now 14 years. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Will the gentleman from New York yield for a question or two?

Mr. OLCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. In the print of this bill, as given in the report of April 20, the age limit in section 1 is 12 years.

Mr. OLCOTT. Yes; but that has been changed to 14. As this bill was read, it gave the age at 14.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. In other respects is the bill the same as the print of this report?

Mr. OLCOTT. In other respects it is the same as the print in the report.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Will the gentleman please state briefly what is the compulsory education law of the District, or is there no compulsory education law in the District?

Mr. OLCOTT. I am unable to state to the gentleman from Ohio, I regret to say. There is a compulsory education law, but I can not state it in full, requiring children to go to school one hundred and thirty days out of the year to be instructed, but I am sorry to say I can not state the exact details of it; but it requires one hundred and thirty days, and that is the reason one hundred and thirty days is carried in this bill. I have already reserved the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I hope that it is needless for me to say that I am delighted to see this bill come out from the Committee on the District of Columbia and put upon its passage before the House. Mr. Speaker, I believe that Congress, having plenary power of legislation in the District of Columbia, subject only to the Bill of Rights contained in the Constitution—having all the powers of our dual sovereignties, State and Federal—ought to make the city of Washington and the District of Columbia a model territory. I am delighted to see a model child-labor law attempted. From what I have been able to learn of this bill it is a good bill, and we on this side are going to show after a bit our realization of the merits of the members of the Committee upon the District of Columbia for bringing it in, not only by permitting this bill to go through without a roll call, but as a matter of reward to the members of that committee, I announce that we will permit several other bills, if from that committee, not exceeding six in number, providing they are in themselves meritorious, to go through without a roll call.

Every time that the Republican side of the House shows a disposition to enact remedial legislation in the interests of the people this side of the House will extend a reward of merit to the deserving committee for their act. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would not only like to see Congress pass for the District of Columbia a model child-labor law, but I would like to see Congress pass a model corporation law.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] whether there is any child-labor law in the State of Mississippi or not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am sorry to say that the child-labor laws of Mississippi are not model labor laws, but I am not discussing them just at this moment. I am standing here for the position that the Congress of the United States ought to set an example to the States, Mississippi included, by making a model child-labor law.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I agree with that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And whether the State of Washington be derelict in its duty, whether the State of Mississippi has been derelict in its duty or not, does not cut any figure in this controversy.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I agree partially with that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I am thoroughly astonished that my friend should attempt to throw my parliamentary street car off the trolley with that question.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I was merely going to submit, that while Congress does have jurisdiction and authority in this particular instance, it seems to me it ill becomes some of us who have not done the best we could within the jurisdiction where we come from, to attempt to make so much capital out of a matter of this kind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That remark may apply to the gentleman from Washington, because it may be true that in the State of Washington he has not done his best along this line. But that does not apply to me, and I will merely quote Shakespeare in final reply and say, "Let the galled jade wince, my withers are unwrung."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would like to say that the State of Washington has passed a very efficient child-labor law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It may be true. I know nothing about that. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to see the city of Washington pass a model corporation law. I would like to see Congress pass for the District of Columbia a model insurance law. I would like to see Congress pass for the District of Columbia a model fire-protection law, and a model manual training school law. I would like to see established here a model agricultural college for the District of Columbia. I would like to see Congress pass a law which should be a model for all the cities of the United States with regard to the management of public utilities in the city of Washington. I would like to see Congress pass for the District of Columbia a law that should be a model for everybody everywhere upon the subject of marriage and divorce. I should like to see Congress pass a law that should be a model for all upon the subject of labor hours, giving eight hours to men to work in, eight hours to sleep in, and leaving them eight hours for edification, worship, and amusement. In a word I would like to see Washington, in the words of the Scriptures, "Like a city on an hill," shedding its light everywhere. And, so far as I am concerned, I am ready always to cooperate with that end in view.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not called for a second with the idea of consuming time. I merely called it for the purpose of emphasizing the fact that upon this side of the Chamber we want to show you how quickly we can pass this law through, and we want to show you right afterwards that we will reward the Committee upon the District of Columbia by allowing you to pass six other bills, provided they be meritorious, and provided the Speaker will recognize the chairman of that committee to propose them, in the usual course, without demand for a second or a roll call, or obstruction of any description.

How much time have I consumed, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Seven minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, as the leader of the minority on this committee is not present, and as no other member from the minority side of the committee has risen to say anything in favor of this, I simply rise to state the position of the minority members of the committee as I understand it, and I believe I am also stating the position of every member of the committee when I say that we are heartily in favor of the enactment of this bill as presented. When the bill was first presented a change was made to 12 years. The object of that was to relieve some of those who were employed about the Capitol, but it was subsequently considered advisable to change that and place the age limit at 14 years, and that was unanimously agreed to. I represent a State, Mr. Speaker, which has one of the best child-labor laws in the United States. We insist strongly that children shall be protected in their tender years, that they shall have an oportunity to attend school and receive an education that will fit them for places in after life. Comparing this law with our law, I think this, if anything, is a better law than ours. The gentlemen who have prepared this bill have taken special care to select the best child-labor laws in the Union as a guide, and the law as presented for the District of Columbia is a model child-labor law. It is so regarded by all organizations all over the United States who have this matter under consideration, and the only objection that has been presented to any members of the committee, I think, upon this question was the provision which made the age limit 12 years. Now that they have been satisfied as to the 14-year limit, no objection whatever is heard upon this ground against this bill from any portion of the United States. The people from all over the country are watching this law. I believe, sir, that it will be a model law. I believe that its provisions will be adopted in States that have no such law to-day; and while we may in the working of it find some little imperfections, those are only matters of detail and can easily be perfected in further laws. I have nothing further to say than that I am heartily in favor of the bill, and I believe that every Member of the minority desires the bill to pass.

Mr. POLLARD. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York why it is, in the classification of work that children can perform, that the sale of newspapers is not included?

Mr. OLCOTT. The sale of newspapers is covered in the same act. If the gentleman will read the bill, he will find that the italicized part at the end of the bill refers to the sale of newspapers and other things on the streets.

Mr. POLLARD. It covers that?

Mr. OLCOTT. Oh, entirely. I yield to the gentleman from New York——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman from New York pardon me just a moment? Is there anybody on this side who desires any time?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. OLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. What provision is made in the bill for the education of children from 10 years of age who are engaged in the sale of papers and other employments on the streets?

Mr. OLCOTT. Before a permit can be granted for the sale of newspapers the child must be provided with a school certificate, which is provided for in other sections of the bill, showing that they have received instruction in the rudimentary subjects for one hundred and thirty days in the previous year.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I understand, then, that the intent of the bill is that those who sell newspapers and engage in other employments mentioned on the streets are required to have similar certificates to those who are engaged in other occupations.

Mr. OLCOTT. The bill provides that a permit can not be granted until a school certificate has been secured. I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, how much time I have left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. OLCOTT. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say that at the beginning of this session I interviewed some of the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to find out whether their intention was to take up this question of a child-labor law and bring in a bill. They assured me it was their intention to do so, and they believed, further, that they would be able to report it in ample time to have it pass at this session of Congress. That was before we had heard very much from the gentleman from Mississippi upon the subject. I felt the necessity of passing such a law, and a law that would be in some respects a model, although we had presented a model of such laws in the State of New York some years ago, and there have been in the State of Massachusetts and nearly all the industrial States of the North good child-labor laws for years. I was aware of the fact that they had not an adequate law in the State of Mississippi and in other States of that locality, and I was anxious that there should be good, timely legislation on this subject, and that there should be put upon the national statute book, as well as the statutes we have in the Republican States, an adequate child-labor law, so that the gentlemen down there should have an object lesson [applause on the Republican side], and, perhaps, they might awake out of their lethargy on the subject and not spend the whole time in scolding the Republican majority in this Congress. We are taking up these matters as they come along, working them out in our own way, without any help or aid from the gentleman from Mississippi. It does not make any difference whether he calls for the yeas and nays on this bill or any other. It will not turn Members on this side against using their own judgment as to the merits of any proposition without any reference to the action of the gentleman from Mississippi or anybody else on that side of the House. [Renewed applause on the Republican side.] Members on this side simply do their duty as they see it, Mr. Speaker. I trust they will do it intelligently, and with a view to the best interests of the people. They will not be driven by any demagogic appeals into making mistakes. I trust they will pass wise legislation, that the quality of the legislation will be right, and the quantity doubtless will satisfy the American people, as it has during the sway of the Republican party in Congress and in the nation for the last twelve years. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] We do not confine ourselves, over on this side, simply to carping and criticising. We are doing the business of the people, and we are doing it in our own way; and we will continue to do that, without let or hindrance by the minority—the people who sit upon that side of the Chamber. If it amuses them, satisfies their intellect, and furnishes enough intellectual pabulum for them upon this or any other subject to stand up, as most anybody can stand up, and demand the yeas and nays, and second the demand, even if it is enforced by an agreement in writing, to follow the leader upon such a weighty proposition as that—even if they do that, and try to delay the House, we will find some way, Mr. Speaker, in the future, as we have in the past, to pass the laws that we desire to pass. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, nobody is better aware than I am of the absolutely irrestrainable eagerness of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in behalf of reformatory legislation of every description. Nobody is better aware of the fact that no amount of spurring or nagging can have any effect upon the slow, lethargic, but constant and self-conscious wisdom of the Republican leader. He is a recent, but very arduous and very strenuous, convert to many things. He is not only now—here of these late days, for the first time—in favor of a model child-labor law for the District of Columbia, but we have got him to where he has absolutely introduced a bill with an anti-injunction title—a title, at any rate—to prevent the undue and hasty issuance of injunctions sacrificing the rights of laboring men. It will not be long before we will have him right up on the front bench—the mourners' bench—right under the pulpit, shouting "Salvation! I've got it! Hallelujah, hallelujah! Amen!" [Laughter.] Why, I would not be surprised if before we get through this session of the House the gentleman would be going through the motions, at any rate (having learned how to go through them in the case of his anti-injunction bill)—going through the motions, at any rate, of advocating a bill for publicity of campaign contributions, especially those made at the expense of innocent stockholders. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman is mistaken if he thinks that I do not know that nothing ever stirred him up to attempt to do anything, except perhaps the fear of popular wrath to come in the future, and even that has to be borne in on him by outside party pressure. I am more rejoiced than anybody at even the small amount of acceleration of unaccustomed legislative activity that has been lately noticed in the gentleman from New York.

Now, perhaps, a moment ago in answer to the gentleman from Washington I did some injustice to the good old State of Mississippi. There are hardly any child-labor laws there, and there ought to be better ones; but it must be remembered in excuse for Mississippi that she has no mines at all, no little children during their play hours, when their hearts ought to be singing with gladness to God, working down in the mines. It should be remembered that Mississippi has almost no factories, and the few that she has are of the most healthful sort, or are sawmills where strong-muscled men are needed; and the few children who are working in Mississippi are for the most part working during school vacation times, out under the open sky, in the fields, upon the farms. It is a fact that whenever necessity comes and creates a problem, good men solve the problem by legislation. Had the necessity come to Mississippi, I doubt not that the philanthropy and patriotism and good feeling of her people would have passed laws equal in effect to those of Massachusetts, or to the best laws in the Union; and I mention Massachusetts with peculiar honor in this connection, because I believe she has the best laws upon this subject, as far as I know.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me appeal to the gentleman from New York not to turn his face against good things merely because Democratic sinners desire them, not to be prone to nonactivity and lack of motion merely because of activity upon this side. Let him help us to pass a model child-labor law for the District of Columbia; let him be the first Republican; let him, being the leader of his "great party," be the first man to speak out in favor of honesty in elections and the publicity—and pre-election publication at that—of campaign contributions, so that hereafter, when the American people shall elect a President, we shall know that he has been elected by men whose ballots have fallen swift to do justice, and not by money. What is the matter with us, that we can not pass such a law before election? Shall it go over until after the election, too, like so many things, or shall we confess that we have no information upon that question, as upon nearly all other questions, and appoint a commission or a special committee to find out what there is to know about it? Shall we appoint a commission to find out whether or not in the past money has been corruptly used in elections in America, whether or not the Republican party has received a great deal of it? Or shall we act now, before the election, and shall we have the benefit of the gentleman's all-powerful leadership in it? Mine is powerless. Here stand I, who have no power to do anything, save to criticise, save to suggest, save to nag, save to try to arouse a public opinion that shall force others to act.

The gentleman delights in telling us that we of ourselves in this Congress can do nothing. He does not even admit that we can bring pressure to bear from the common country, though I think we can. But there you stand—great leader of the majority—all powerful. A mere word from him will bring recognition from you, Mr. Speaker, who honor him so highly, and that recognition will enable him to put upon its passage the McCall bill for publicity of campaign contributions, that has been reported favorably, if reluctantly and lately by the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Members of Congress. The gentleman from New York tells me that he will be guided by his own judgment. "A Daniel come to judgment. I thank thee, Jew, for the word." It is to your judgment I appeal, to your patriotism. I am not trying to bulldoze him or you, I am not trying to force him or you, I am not trying to coerce him or you, I am trying to see if you have got a heart and a mind in you that can be appealed to in behalf of honesty in elections, in behalf of fairness to the laboring men, in behalf of justice, when the Federal courts are acting upon secret and ex parte testimony, in setting aside solemn laws passed by sovereign States in solemn State legislatures.

Why, the gentleman from New York seems to take it as a personal offense that a Democrat on this floor should have an opinion about legislation, that he should attempt to rivet public attention on affairs of legislation. He hopes to be able to go to the country in the last few days of the session with a few of the bills demanded by public opinion, purposely kept back until it is hoped that they can go to sleep in the Senate and thus save the faces of Members on the Republican side who may thus go to their constituents and say, "Well, we passed a campaign contribution publicity or other bill in the House, but the Senate didn't pass it."

Why not pass bills now? Why wait until six or seven days before Congress adjourns? Why not act as you are acting about this child-labor bill? If you do it, do we Democrats gain any advantage in a partisan sense? No; you gain it. If you pass good legislation, you will get the credit for it. As far as I am concerned, as a mere partisan Democrat, if I were not actuated by a desire to do good to the country, as well as by a desire to do good to the Democratic party, I would go down on my knees and pray that you pass no good legislation, so that you might be by the people damned on the day of your final hearing and judgment. Being guided however by some idea of public benefit, I pray that you may pass some good legislation; all of credit I ask for us is the recognition of the fact that we spurred you on and did our share. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLCOTT. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi, in apologizing for his State in not having passed a good child-labor law, says that Mississippi has neither mines nor factories. Neither has the District of Columbia mines or factories. But that is no reason, in my judgment, why a child-labor law should not have been placed on the statute books of the great State of Mississippi. I sincerely hope that the gentleman from Mississippi, after he shall have given up his seat in this House and before he takes his seat in the body at the other end of this Capitol, will go among his people and plead with them that they may place upon the statute books of that State a suitable child-labor law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He has already done it.

Mr. KAHN. The Committee on the District of Columbia that had charge of this bill studied the child-labor laws of practically every State in the Union, and in bringing in this bill in its present form we believe that we have adopted the best features of all the legislation that has been enacted upon the subject of child labor in this country. Practically every State that has enacted this class of legislation has provisions similar to those which appear in the Senate bill as it was passed by that body. These provide for the regulation of the labor of children in stores, in factories, in workshops, and so on; but there are very few States that make provision for regulating the labor of children who work upon the street.

Mr. HACKNEY. I understand that you have a few mines in California?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HACKNEY. I see no provision against children working in mines, as stated in this report. Is that correct?

Mr. KAHN. The children do not work in the mines of California. We never had children at work in the mines of California. The child-labor law of that State is admittedly one of the best child-labor laws found in the United States. As a matter of fact, the provisions with respect to children on the streets are exceedingly necessary here in the District. I dare say that it has been the experience of almost every Member of this House in coming from the theater, probably at 11 o'clock at night, to have been met by some child that ought to have been at home and in bed, and that told a pitiful tale, which had been learned by heart, the while it offered to sell shoestrings or newspapers or something of that kind.

It seems to me that it is exceedingly necessary that those children should be looked after by the proper authorities of this District. The committee felt that by inserting those provisions of this bill they are doing those children and this community a great service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I will yield one more minute to the gentleman in order that he may answer the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I find in the report that accompanies this bill a statement, and I want to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] if the statement be true. It is to the effect that in California, the gentleman's State, there is a prohibition against children under 12 years of age working in any factory, workshop, or mercantile establishment, but no prohibition against their working in mines.

Mr. KAHN. The only kind of mines we have in the State of California are gold mines, and children do not work in gold mines.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is that statement true?

Mr. KAHN. I think that the law since then has been amended, and I feel quite confident that the age limit in the State of California is 14 years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Instead of 12.

Mr. KAHN. Instead of 12.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman think they are now forbidden by law to work in mines?

Mr. KAHN. Why, there is no necessity to pass any law on that subject, because they do not work in gold mines.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If not, then why should there be any necessity to pass any in Mississippi, when there are not any kind of mines there, gold or any other? [Laughter.]

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Mississippi gave that as a reason why there was no child-labor law in Mississippi. The State of California has passed a child-labor law, notwithstanding the fact that children do not work in the mines in that State. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there are some coal mines in California.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, there is only one thing I wish to say in regard to the work that has been done by the Committee on the District of Columbia on this bill. At the very beginning of the session, as soon as the committee organized and the subcommittees had been named, a child-labor bill was considered by that committee and a considerable study was made by the members of the subcommittee and by the members of the entire committee as to what the laws were in the several States. We did not need any urging by gentlemen on the other side of this House. We worked at it conscientiously and consistently, and I wish to say further that two years ago, at the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, the House of Representatives brought in and passed a child-labor bill which then received the commendation of most of the people who have made a study of the welfare of children throughout the entire country. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules, agreeing to the substitute, and passing the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 200, answered "present" 9, not voting 178, as follows:

So the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until Tuesday:

Mr. OLMSTED with Mr. ROTHERMEL.

Until further notice:

Mr. VREELAND with Mr. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. COLE with Mr. WEISSE.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD with Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN.

Mr. LINDBERGH with Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN.

Mr. KNOWLAND with Mr. KIPP.

Mr. KINKAID with Mr. DAVENPORT.

Mr. HAUGEN with Mr. CRAVENS.

Mr. ESCH with Mr. COCKRAN.

Mr. DUNWELL with Mr. BURGESS.

Mr. DRISCOLL with Mr. ASHBROOK.

Mr. MADDEN with Mr. LEVER.

For the session:

Mr. WANGER with Mr. ADAMSON.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN]. On the first roll call I voted "present." I have been informed that if the gentleman from Texas were present he would vote "aye." I desire to withdraw my former vote and vote "aye."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Call the name of the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. HULL of Iowa and he answered "aye."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, on this measure I voted "aye." I have a general pair with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr BARTLETT], and I desire to withdraw my vote and vote "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Call the name of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BUTLER, and he answered "present."

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. Speaker, on this vote I voted "aye." I have a pair with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. I desire to withdraw my vote and vote "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Call the name of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. WASHBURN, and he answered "present."

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, on this roll call I voted "present." I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], but under an arrangement made with the Republican whip, I desire to change my vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BURLESON, and he answered "aye."

Mr. HAGGOTT. Mr. Speaker, on the first roll call I answered "present." I am paired with Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN of North Carolina, and I understand that if he were present he would vote "aye." By arrangement, I wish to vote "aye."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. HAGGOTT, and he voted "aye."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 20345) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. CLAY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

AMENDING ACT CREATING BUREAU OF IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the following bill with the amendments indicated in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21052) to amend sections 11 and 13 of an act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States."

Be it enacted, etc., That section 11 of an act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States, approved June 29, 1906, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following:

"At any time within sixty days from the date of the entry of a final order in a naturalization case, either the applicant for admission to citizenship or the United States may take an appeal from such order on questions of law only to the United States circuit court of appeals for the circuit in which such order is entered. The judgments, orders, or decrees of the circuit courts of appeals in such cases shall be final in the same manner and to the same extent as is now provided by section 6 of the act of March 3, 1891, establishing circuit courts of appeals."

SEC. 2. That section 13 of the act approved June 29, 1906, entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States," is hereby amended by striking out the last sentence of the section, which reads as follows: "And in case the clerk of any court collects fees in excess of the sum of $6,000 in any one year, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may allow to such clerk from the money which the United States shall receive additional compensation for the employment of additional clerical assistance, but for no other purpose, if in the opinion of the said Secretary the business of such clerk warrants such allowance," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"And in case the clerk of any court exercising naturalization jurisdiction collects fees in excess of the sum of $6,000 in any fiscal year the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may allow salaries, only for naturalization purposes, to pay for clerical assistants, to be selected and employed by that clerk, additional to the clerical force, which clerks of courts are required to pay for by section 13 of the act of June 29, 1906 (34 Stat., p. 596), from fees received by such clerks in naturalization proceedings, if, in the opinion of said Secretary, the naturalization business of such clerk warrants further additional assistance. Such amount as may be necessary to pay the additional clerical assistance herein provided for is hereby permanently appropriated from any naturalization fees collected by such clerk and deposited in the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That the total salaries of such additional clerical assistants shall in no instance exceed the fees received by the United States from the clerk of that court during such fiscal year: Provided further, That when, at the close of any fiscal year, the business of such clerk of court indicates that the naturalization fees for the succeeding fiscal year will exceed $6,000 the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may authorize the continuance of the allowance of salaries for the additional clerical assistance herein provided for and employed on the last day of the fiscal year until such time as the remittances indicate that the fees for the ensuing fiscal year will not be sufficient to allow the additional clerical assistance authorized by this act.

"That payment for the additional clerical assistance herein authorized shall be in the manner and under such regulations as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may prescribe."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee demands a second. Under the rule a second is ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Which gentleman desires to be recognized for a second? The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. He is on the committee, I presume.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, that is all right.

Mr. GARRETT. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] what this is. Is it a rearrangement of the fees?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It is a little more than that. Mr. Speaker, this bill does two things. In the first place, it provides for appeals by either party on questions of law only, and, in the second place, it corrects an error in the act of 1906. There is a law, passed in 1902, which provides that when you appropriate money from the Treasury you have to use the words "is hereby appropriated," or something equivalent. When we drew our act of 1906 all we said was "that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may allow to such clerks," without the specific words for appropriation. When the first request got up to the Comptroller of the Currency he refused it, and he drew a substitute for the language.

Mr. HARRISON. Does this increase the cost to an alien to become a citizen of the United States?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It does not. Before my colleague takes his seat I would like to state that that language is in the original bill, but that is stricken out by amendment, so the cost of naturalization is not increased by this bill.

Mr. HINSHAW. Wherein does this bill change the fees to be paid to the clerk of the district court?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It does not change them an iota. It simply corrects an error.

Mr. BONYNGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly.

Mr. BONYNGE. How much is the fee to be paid on filing the application for naturalization? Is it $2, the same as before?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Whatever it is now. This language here is struck out as the amendment.

Mr. BONYNGE. That entire paragraph on page 3 is stricken out?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. BONYNGE. Can the gentleman answer a few questions that I would like to ask in regard to it?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will try. The gentleman's knowledge is more extensive than mine.

Mr. BONYNGE. I want to get information. That is why I am asking the gentleman. How much has been collected, does he know, from naturalization fees during the existence of the naturalization law and paid into the Treasury?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Something over $200,000, I should say.

Mr. BONYNGE. Since the law went into effect?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes.

Mr. BONYNGE. So that it would be possible, would it not, to allow the clerks of the court additional fees, or a larger percentage of the fees paid by the applicants, without increasing the fees to the applicants?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It might be possible to do it.

Mr. BONYNGE. And at the same time make the law self-supporting?

Mr. BENNET of New York. No, sir; because the operation of the law now for this fiscal year costs something like $214,000, and the law has been in effect a little bit over a fiscal year. It went into effect on the 28th of September, 1906, as the gentleman recollects, and up until the 31st of March the money that has been paid in to the Government has been something over $200,000.

Mr. BONYNGE. How much has been appropriated out of the Treasury for the support of the Bureau and for all other expenses incident to the establishment of the Bureau?

Mr. BENNET of New York. There had been appropriated originally in the bill $100,000. Of that less than $30,000 was used. Then there has been appropriated for this fiscal year up to the 1st of July $193,000, making a total which will have been expended at that time of $223,000.

Mr. BONYNGE. Now, how much, if the gentleman can tell me——

Mr. BENNET of New York. That is approximate.

Mr. BONYNGE. Yes. How much has been expended for the maintenance of the Bureau in Washington? What does that cost?

Mr. BENNET of New York. My recollection is that the expenses of the Bureau in Washington are something like $30,000 a year.

Mr. BONYNGE. Thirty thousand dollars a year. And all the balance of the $193,000 that has been expended, then, has been expended for agents and attorneys outside of the city of Washington?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Exactly. The balance, outside of expenditures at the rate of $30,000 a year for the division, has been spent in the field work.

Mr. BONYNGE. Now, at the time the committee was considering the bill we anticipated that the larger part of the expense would be in maintaining the Bureau in Washington. Is not that the fact?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will answer what was in my friend's mind, that the intention and hope was that, while the direction should be in the division, the expense should be largely division expense.

Mr. BONYNGE. And the expense outside was to be merely incidental?

Mr. BENNET of New York. And small.

Mr. BURNETT. I want to know of the gentleman from New York whether there is a reprint of the bill? Part of section 2 has been stricken out. Now, I want to know whether there is a reprint of the bill with that stricken out?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It is offered now as an amendment.

Mr. HINSHAW. I would like to ask the gentleman whether there is any bill reported that proposes to raise the fees of the clerks?

Mr. BENNET of New York. There is not. There is a bill reported to the House increasing the fee to be paid by the applicant. That was a part of this bill, but has been stricken out by the amendment.

Mr. HINSHAW. How much of an increase is provided?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Three dollars for each applicant.

Mr. HINSHAW. Do you not consider that too large an increase?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I do not think it is.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the bill purport to change the qualifications of persons seeking naturalization?

Mr. BENNET of New York. No, sir.

Mr. FINLEY. To what extent does it change the law?

Mr. BENNET of New York. None. In that regard it simply corrects a defect. We did not use the words "the money is hereby appropriated." We simply stated it was allowed.

Mr. FINLEY. What was the number of persons naturalized last year, if the gentleman knows?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Why, my recollection is that the naturalization was at about the rate of 80,000 a year. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I understand this bill provides the right of appeal to both sides.

Mr. BENNET of New York. It does—to both sides.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. In the event of the attorney in the case taking an appeal, would not that throw an extra expense upon the person desiring to be naturalized?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It would throw the expense of his attorney upon him, of course.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. And if an appeal was taken under these circumstances—say, sixty days before an election takes place—would not that tie up the naturalization during that length of time, or until the appeal was decided?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It would not; there is no supersedeas in the bill.

Mr. GRIGGS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. GRIGGS. This bill says that there are to be appeals on questions of law. Is there any appeal on questions of fact?

Mr. BENNET of New York. No, sir.
Mr. GRIGGS. This does not admit it?
Mr. BENNET of New York. No, sir.
Mr. GRIGGS. Why not?
Mr. BENNET of New York. Well, because the matter of naturalization is so largely in the discretion of the judge. He can tell so much from the appearance and demeanor of the applicant that you could never get into the record that, as a matter of fact, it is hardly worth while to allow an appeal on the facts; whereas if the man is denied a legal right, he ought to have it.
Mr. GRIGGS. What is the present law in that regard?
Mr. BENNET of New York. There is no appeal provided for.
Mr. GRIGGS. At all?
Mr. BENNET of New York. None whatever.
Mr. GRIGGS. And this bill simply provides an appeal on questions of law?
Mr. BENNET of New York. Exactly. It enlarges the remedy to that extent. I reserve the balance of my time.
Mr. GARRETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska.
Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Speaker, when this same bill was brought before the House under request for unanimous consent some time ago, I stated, and now repeat, that it seems to me manifestly unjust after providing qualifications for the admission of aliens to citizenship in the United States, and providing a small fee for admission in order that the path to citizenship may be made simple and easy, to defeat the purpose by a bill like this. This bill will permit any United States district attorney to appeal naturalization cases and force an applicant for naturalization to employ an attorney at his own expense in order to defend his application in the circuit court of appeals. Practically, so far as the applicant is concerned, it may operate as an enormous increase in the cost of his becoming a citizen, not because of any question of fact, but simply because of an alleged error of the local judge in admitting the man to citizenship.
Now, it seems to me that if it is so important to provide that district attorneys and immigration officials may appeal from the decision of the local judge in these cases, in order to unify and harmonize the law, the poor applicant for citizenship should not be made to bear the whole burden of testing the judgments of State or Federal judges; and for that reason, if for no other, I shall vote against this bill.
But, Mr. Speaker, I believe that there is another reason here. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] has said that this does not operate as a supersedeas, and that the applicant for citizenship will still have the right to vote pending the appeal. I think there is a very grave question whether the gentleman is correct in that statement. If the gentleman is satisfied of its correctness, I should like to have him cite his authority. It looks to me as though it would be possible for any United States district attorney or immigration official at the time that a large number of applications for citizenship are made to the proper court, and after the judge had admitted the applicants to citizenship, by appealing a large number of those cases to deprive those men of the right to vote at the approaching election, and certainly unless that matter can be clarified it offers an additional reason for voting against this bill in its present form. But, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, while this country is clamoring for bills of real importance, clamoring for measures which are generally demanded by the people, clamoring for measures which are recommended by the President of the United States, clamoring for measures which have the support of a majority of the Members of this House at the present time, it seems to me it would be better to bring in some of those bills than to bring in these ill-considered and partly digested bills, of which not even a print has been made in the perfected form. I do not see why the time of the House should be taken up on bills of a questionable character of this sort when we have bills that are demanded by the people that are of vast interest to everybody.
Mr. GARRETT. I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].
Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, there are two amendments to the naturalization law which we passed at the last session of Congress embraced in this bill. One, as has been stated, is an amendment to make clear the right of appeal to the United States circuit court of appeals of both the Government and the applicant for naturalization. The purpose of the act that was passed at the last session was that there should be a uniform naturalization law. Yet we find, as a matter of fact, that this naturalization law, as it is being executed, is not uniform. I have heard of judges, and no doubt have heard correctly, who have decided that Japs were not entitled to naturalization. It shows that different judges construe the law in different ways, and the committee believe that there ought to be some tribunal whose decision would be binding upon the inferior courts, and hence it has provided in this bill that both the Government and the applicant may appeal to the United States circuit court of appeals.
Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman permit an interruption at that point?
Mr. BURNETT. Certainly.
Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it in the interest of a correct decision of the law to provide for the appeal of a case to an upper court, and then not to provide that both sides shall be represented and heard? And does not this bill, by providing that one side shall be heard in the person of the district attorney, when the poor applicant on the other side may not be heard at all, because unable to hire a lawyer, virtually provide for only an ex parte hearing of the case?
Mr. BURNETT. This bill does provide that both sides shall be heard, but the other proposition would not permit both sides to be heard. We believe the Government ought to be represented; but if there has been improper action by the courts below, that the Government ought to have the right to appeal in order to have that corrected. Is not that right? If there has been an error of law against the Government, if those Japanese that I referred to were improperly naturalized, ought not the Government to have the right of appeal? And that is just what this bill does. It gives both sides the right to be heard. The gentleman's idea would only allow the applicant's side to be heard, and no matter how unjustly the Government might have been treated by the judge below in his conclusions of the law, the Government can not now be heard in the upper court, because the Government can not appeal.
Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact that both sides are heard before the district court?
Mr. BURNETT. Why, yes.
Mr. HITCHCOCK. When the appeal is taken, suppose the appellee does not appear; suppose he is too poor to spend $50 or $100 for an attorney; then only one side is heard in the upper court.
Mr. BURNETT. Not at all; because it is presumed that the judges will decide the law, not in the interest of the side that appeals, but in the interest of justice and the interests of the proper execution of the law. [Applause.] But what would be the effect of the other proposition? The other proposition is that, though the interests of the Government may be never so egregiously offended against, it has no right of appeal whatever. Is it not just as proper that the rights of the Government should be protected as those of the applicant? Take the argument of the gentleman. There is many a man to-day who has been convicted of crime who would like to appeal his case to the Supreme Court of the United States, but because he is unable to employ counsel, he can not do it. I remember representing twenty-six Whitecappers in my district at one time. Thirteen of them were convicted, and by reason of the fact that there were thirteen of them they were able to employ an attorney, and they came here, and the Supreme Court of the United States, in a decision about an inch long, said they were unfairly and improperly tried; that the adjudication was wrong, and that the indictment ought to have been quashed, and they quashed it from the bench. And yet, if there had been but one of these men, that man could never have had the case tried.
Mr. HITCHCOCK. We have a case in which there is only one man. Suppose John Smith applies for naturalization and the court decides in his favor. He would get his papers; but the United States Government appeals the case, and he is too poor to prosecute his appeal on his side.
Mr. BURNETT. But he is represented by a court that decides justly, not for the Government alone, but for both sides. The law says that he may appeal if he has been decided against. But if the case has been decided against the Government the gentleman would not say that the Government ought not to appeal the case where a man has wrongfully been admitted to be a citizen of this country.
Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman give his opinion in regard to the criticism that this measure, if it becomes a law, may suspend a duly made citizen's right until after the election?
Mr. BURNETT. I have not investigated that, but I am inclined to think that it would not suspend it.
Mr. BENNET of New York. I have investigated it, and I say that it would not suspend naturalization.
Mr. HARRISON. What reason has my colleague for that opinion?
Mr. HAY. I have looked it up and there is no supersedeas provided for.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not think that the bare fact that the Government has appealed would for that reason suspend the rights of the applicant, unless the statute so stated; but, gentlemen, I do not think it would be harsh if it did.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FINLEY. In case of an appeal, would not the case be heard on the record as made up in the lower court?

Mr. BURNETT. Certainly; it is the question of law which goes upon the record.

Mr. FINLEY. So the court would have every fact upon which to base a proper determination?

Mr. BURNETT. The appellate court would not decide the facts, but it would decide if there was any error of law.

Mr. FINLEY. But it would have the facts in the case to judge whether or not any error at law had been made.

Mr. BURNETT. Of course the record would be before the court. But now, gentlemen, in regard to the other amendment provided for in the bill. It is a mere question of administration. We attempted in the bill to provide for the payment of clerks and additional clerical force necessary to prevent congested naturalization, but we failed to say "which is hereby appropriated;" and under the rulings of the Comptroller they had no authority to make payment under it, and for that reason the second proposition in the bill is merely for the purpose of correcting that.

I do not think this is an unjust law, and I say that the Government of the United States ought to have its rights in the appellate court as well as the applicant himself. It is in the interest of good citizenship and of a uniform administration of the law. Even suppose the applicant is temporarily suspended during the appeal, I do not believe it would be harsh. I do not believe it would be unjust or wrong to require him to wait for the purpose of having the question of citizenship decided by the appellate court when by the decision in his case it would possibly decide the case of thousands of others. I do not believe that even if it suspended his citizenship pending the appeal it would be an unjust or harsh law. I now yield back the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee. [Applause.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. I now yield five minutes to my colleague from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago the gentleman from Mississippi made an astounding statement as to the number of factories in Mississsippi. The gentleman from California understood him to say that there were none, and I understood him to say scarcely any. Since then the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] has had occasion to inquire at the Bureau of Manufactures about factories in Mississippi, and the Bureau reports that the census of 1900 shows that there were 1,294. That is a pretty good start for Mississippi. It shows that there were 36,799 wage-earners, and of these there were 1,015 children under 16. In the census bulletin of 1904, the children had increased to 1,272. Now, the gentleman when he goes to Mississippi ought to be able to recognize a factory when he sees it [laughter], and the fact that children are working in the factory. I hope that in the next two years after he ceases to be a Member of Congress and before he takes his seat in the other body, he sees to it that Mississippi does something on the child-labor law.

Mr. Speaker, the most astounding thing to this side is to see the Democratic party clamoring for a national law interfering with Congressional elections. The gentleman from Mississippi has the hardihood to say that he is in favor of honest elections, and taunts somebody on this side as not being in favor of it. Since when was the Democratic party in favor of honest elections? Was it when they were depriving a certain class of fellow-citizens of suffrage by every means they could invent—by fraud, and intimidation, and murder, and riot, and every crime under the sun? Was it when they were depriving these poor people of their right of suffrage that they were in favor of honest elections? Was it in my State, Mr. Speaker, when time after time they carried the election, not by the honest ballot, but by fraudulent votes deposited in the ballot box and by fraudulent counts, well known to all the world, in the great city of New York, in the city of Troy, in the city of Albany—sending around gangs of five to repeat from poll to poll, impersonating well-known Republican citizens and swearing that they were the citizens registered under that name; and being allowed by Democratic officials to vote these men, and then when the honest voter came around depriving him of his vote? Was it then that they were in favor of honest elections?

Mr. HARRISON. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Were they in favor of honest elections when we passed through the Republican legislature in the State of New York a corrupt-practice act, when we followed it up by a publicity act, and was the Democratic party standing by doing anything? Yes—criticising and caviling and scolding and all that sort of thing. I do not need to describe it. We see an exhibition of it here in the halls of Congress day after day—the kind of performance that those same gentlemen up there indulged in. When were they in favor of honest elections? Why, only when they got a majority that way. Is it necessary for the Democratic party in the State of Maryland to disfranchise the black man in that State? You put it on the plea in the South that they were an overwhelming number and that they were led by dishonest men, and that they were getting their hands into the Treasury and were mulcting the taxpayers and depriving people of their property. Is that necessary in the State of Maryland? Maryland has got the habit of going now and then Republican in these later days. The people are getting educated; they are getting educated up to Republican ideas. The Republican party has an honest majority in that State, and in order to meet it—temporarily having gotten into power in that State—you are bending every effort to deprive every colored citizen of the right of franchise, hoping thereby to make a Democratic State of the State of Maryland. Oh, I like to hear a Democrat talk about honest elections. It is talk, talk, talk, from beginning to end. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Having the power, when you are in power, point me to the statute that you have ever put on the statute books that insures honesty in elections. Mr. Speaker, we get this thing day by day; we get it from the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and once in a while we hear a weak echo from the State of Nebraska upon these various subjects, and still we go right on in our own way. We are doing this business, we are legislating; we are responsible for what we do and we are responsible for what we do not do, and we propose to assume the responsibility for it from beginning to end. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, it is refreshing, because amusing, to hear a lecture upon honesty in elections from the floor leader of the Republican party; the party of "fresh new crisp $2 bills;" the party of "blocks of five;" the party of the city of Philadelphia [laughter and applause on the Democratic side]; the party of the returning boards of Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina, way back in '76; the party that carried or counted the election in '96 by wholesale bribery; the party that in 1904—even that late—denied through its candidate for President that it had been receiving money from the fiduciary funds of corporations for political purposes, and was afterwards convicted of falsehood in the denial; the party of "My Dear Harriman;" the only party that ever stole as big a thing as the Presidency and by its after conduct confessed the theft. Why, here is the good old City of Brotherly Love, just across the way up here. I like it, have been there several times, and have been subjected to arguments of a persuasive character at banquets, but if politically there ever was a thing that was a stench in the nostrils of all humanity, it is the boss-ridden, Republican city of Philadelphia. Why, it was such a bad smell that even the Republicans themselves could not stand it all the time, and they came together for a little while and threw it off, but later, like the dog, went back to their vomit.

There was a time in the history of my own section when there was intimidation and when there was fraud. There was some excuse for it—I do not say justification, though I think so, as far as the intimidation went, but at least for all minds extenuation. When a great race is engaged in saving its civilization, "the fruit of all the ages," there is some excuse, at any rate some extenuation, for setting civilization up above the niceties of statute law. But there was never any excuse, there was never any extenuation for the Republican party in its plebian, plutocratic programme of wholesale bribery in 1876, in 1896, in 1900, and in 1904, when it took the money that belonged to widows and orphans out of fiduciary funds, and never has had the manhood nor the sense of justice to return it since. [Applause on the Democratic side.] One of the most honest men in the Republican party is now sitting in the White House, and at one time did have the manhood, or he is at least reported to have had the manhood, to have said that the Republican campaign committee ought to return the money that had been filched from the widows and orphans and beneficiaries and policy holders of the New York Life and the New York Mutual and the New York Equitable insurance companies to the treasuries of these companies so that it might go to their accumulation funds.

But, under the advice, I presume, of his environment—too strong for him—he has ceased to cheep upon that subject, and no longer do we hear, either in any message to the Congress, wherein ordinarily all matters are dealt with, nor in any interview to the public press, wherein he is freely expressive concerning platitudes of "civic righteousness," any proposition to restore those stolen funds. Yes; there was a time in the history of the South when, as the gentleman from New York charges, revolution sat in the saddle; but since the time when those States adopted their new constitutions there has been no claim upon the part of any honest man that there has been any fraud in Mississippi or, so far as I know, in other Southern States—certainly not in Mississippi. Why, the gentleman speaks of the disfranchisement laws of the Southern States as if they were themselves a fraud. They were passed, on the contrary, for the purpose of preventing fraud, while saving the ideals and civilization of the race from Africanization. They have gone to the Supreme Court of the United States, where better lawyers sit than the gentleman from New York, great lawyer, nonpartisan, and impartial as he is. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And the Supreme Court of the United States has said that those constitutions do not violate a tittle of the Constitution of the United States. Why, the gentleman's soul rebels, he would sententiously pretend, at the idea of "Democrats mentioning" honesty in elections and honesty in administration! Think of that coming from the floor leader of the party of the whisky frauds, the party of the Credit Mobilier, the party of De Golzer-Ames achievement, the party of the star-route frauds! Oh! I could bandy history with the gentleman all day, but I do not want to bandy history. Let the dead past bury itself on both sides. Let the fraud that constituted and constitutes Republicanism in various parts of the country, the fraud that stalked through the South for a while when white men were in desperation saving a race's civilization—let it all go for what it amounts to in history. What are you saying now, now at the present moment? What new history shall we make? What do you, Mr. Republican floor leader, say? [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] Here I stand with shoulders not too broad and strength not too great and presence not too imposing, but standing here at least knowing that I represent the Democratic party in that regard, and so standing here I challenge you that every dollar that goes into campaign funds shall be published to the world the day after it is received so that the world may judge the motive of the giver and the cause of the giving and the means of corruption in the possession of the recipient. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What do you say for the present? What do you say for the future? Let the dead past go. Results I—— [Loud and continued applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from New York has five minutes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to take a vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, we had better have the yeas and nays upon this proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have to count.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is dilatory. I think there is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order and will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-six Members are present, not a quorum, and the Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members. As many as favor the motion will, as their names are called, answer "yea;" as many as are opposed will answer "nay," and those present and not voting will answer "present," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 181, nays 8, answered "present" 15, not voting 183, as follows:

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania with Mr. BRUNDIDGE.

Mr. AMES with Mr. BRANTLEY.

For the balance of the day:

Mr. ESCH with Mr. RICHARDSON.

The SPEAKER. Upon this vote, the yeas are 182, nays 8, answering "present" 14, not voting 183—a quorum.

The bill is passed. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

IMMIGRATION STATION, BOSTON, MASS.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 13851) providing for the purchase of a site and the erection of a new immigration station thereon at the city of Boston, Mass., with committee amendments, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. O'CONNELL] moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13851) providing for the purchase of a site and the erection of a new immigration station thereon at the city of Boston, Mass.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be erected, upon a site now owned by or to be ceded to or purchased by the Government for the purpose of establishing a new immigration station, suitable fireproof building or buildings in connection therewith, at the port of Boston, Mass., on the mainland or in the city of Boston, or on some island in Boston Harbor other than Castle Island.

SEC. 2. That the expenditure of the sum of $250,000 is hereby authorized for the purchase of ground for and the complete erection and furnishing of said building, which shall be paid from the "immigrant fund;" that the said building shall be erected in accordance with plans and specifications to be prepared by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, and under the supervision of said Department.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded? If not, as many as favor the motion will say "aye," and as many as are opposed will say "no." [After a pause.] The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it, and, in the opinion of the Chair, a majority have voted therefor, and the bill is passed.

MICHIGAN CITY (IND.) HARBOR.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution No. 79 and pass the same.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 79) authorizing the widening of the channel of Michigan City Harbor.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to use any unexpended balance of money heretofore appropriated or that may be hereafter appropriated for the improvement or maintenance of the harbor at Michigan City, Ind., for the rebuilding of the western revetment of said harbor upon a new alignment, with the view of widening the channel of said harbor.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to twenty minutes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, the resolution simply authorizes the Secretary of War to make such use of an appropriation carried in the river and harbor bill of the last Congress as was intended but not expressed. The recommendation of the War Department was for the rebuilding of the western revetment of the Michigan City harbor. Fifty thousand dollars was estimated as the necessary amount, and upon the recommendation of the engineer in charge $10,000 was added to that, with the view of widening the harbor at one place. And when the Secretary of War came to make use of the money he decided that he could not change the alignment of the revetment without authority from Congress, and he held up the appropriation of last year until the necessary authority could be obtained from Congress. The resolution does not increase the appropriation. It simply authorizes the use of the money for the purpose for which it was intended to be appropriated, and that is all there is to the resolution.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House reported unanimously a resolution in identically the same language as the one under consideration, and it is now on the Calendar of the House. I had the resolution introduced in the Senate, and it passed the Senate, so that there can be no question about losing out. If the House takes the proper action upon the Senate resolution, that will be the end of the matter.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the Committee on the District of Columbia had a bill before the House that had some very important matters in it and I acted on the assumption that more of that committee's bills would be recognized for consideration. Of course I am not criticising the parabolic and circular manner in which recognitions are being given or scattered by the Speaker about the House; his recognitions are like "the peace of God" in one respect only, their causes are "past finding out." But we had just indicated a willingness to let six good bills from the District of Columbia Committee go through if they were brought up. One of them I know they have ready is the Benning road antigambling bill, which is very much desired by the citizens of Washington, and by "gude people" everywhere. It is ready to be reported to the House at any minute. I had hoped the Speaker would let us consider and pass it. I have no objection to this particular bill now under consideration, except it seems to me it is not nearly as important as a great many bills which the Speaker could have recognized gentlemen to offer to the House. Amongst others, at least, six bills from the District of Columbia Committee. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. MURPHY] tells me they have at least six that are perfectly good.

And then, again, the Speaker might have recognized somebody to put through the McCall bill for preelection publication of campaign contributions, or to take up the bill that has come so strangely and unexpectedly out from the mind of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]—his so-called "anti-injunction bill"—but not to take that last bill up, however, under suspension, but to take it up in the ordinary way, subject to amendment, because it would need very material amendments before it became much more than existing law or corresponded in context with its pretext. I do not want to spend the time of the committee, Mr. Speaker. You know how careful I am of the time of the House and how desirious I am to expedite really important public business. I do not feel like opposing this bill of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] just because it is in the wrong place. It is perhaps like somebody said of Andrew Johnson when he was President. They said "He was the blamedest rightest man in the blamedest wrongest place that they knew of." This bill may be a very good bill, but it seems to me to be out of place—unduly promoted. It would be better to be permitting us to pass upon the Benning road antigambling bill, as we announced our willingness to do, without any call for a second or without even a roll call. It could be passed in about three minutes. Or we could pass the McCall bill from the Committee on Elections of President, Vice-President, and Members of Congress, requiring preelection publication of campaign contributions. We could pass it in fifteen minutes by the Speaker's watch.

That, too, could pass without a demand for a second under motion to suspend the rules and without a roll call. I am in favor, of all things, Mr. Speaker, of economizing public time. [Laughter.] And instead of taking up the time of the House on bills which require a second and forty minutes of debate and a roll call, as this bill does, I think the Speaker ought to have recognized somebody for a bill that would not have required any second and would not have required any roll call. I have said all this, Mr. Speaker, with the modesty that becomes the leader of the minority—helpless and powerless, everything except speechless, and nearly that, and daily admonished that it can not do anything and that the other fellows—the Big Four—are responsible, and gladly responsible, for all sins of omission as well as of commission. I think that their prayer ought to be one of those contained in the English prayer book. I think you are all good Episcopalians on the Republican side of the House, Mr. Speaker, at least in so far as the prayer you ought to pray is concerned. You are always "leaving undone those things which ought to be done and doing those things which ought to be left undone," and there is precious little political health in you. Why prefer for recognition this poor little bill? And this is not by any means the strongest instance of that sort of preference, but I am perfectly willing it shall be allowed to go through after a roll call. I thank you for your evident pleasure in listening to me, Mr. Speaker. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, we had better have the yeas and nays, to expedite the public business.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Before announcing the result of the count, the gentleman from New York will withhold the point of no quorum. The gentleman from Nebraska desires to have a reprint of a report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, what was the result of the call for the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska desires to ask unanimous consent to have a reprint of a report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I have no objection to any request for a reprint. What is it upon?

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, for a reprint of House Report No. 1505.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is it?

Mr. NORRIS. It is a report on House bill No. 20111.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it now exhausted?

Mr. NORRIS. It is now exhausted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the subject of the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. It is on the publicity of campaign expenses. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is that the hearings of the committee?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it is the report of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The report of the committee, and it is exhausted already! What a wonderful amount of report with so slight a suspicion of legislation! [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from New York renews the point of no quorum. One hundred and fifty present; not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members. As many as are in favor of the motion will, as their names are called, answer "yea;" those opposed will answer "nay;" those present and not voting will answer "present," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 179, nays 1, answered "present" 18, not voting 190, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, May 10, 1908.

The House met at 2 o'clock p. m. and was called to order by Mr. POLLARD as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, center and source of all our longings, hopes, and aspirations, we gather here to-day in response to a pure and holy desire which springs from the deeps of our being.

Death has claimed for its own one who served for many years with distinction and fidelity his State and nation upon the floor of this House and left behind him a memory which shall not fade while those who knew him shall live.

We come to thank Thee for what he was and what he did, to recall the qualities of mind and heart which made him attractive and lovable, and we most fervently pray that his life and character may be an inspiration to those who knew him and to those who shall come after us. We thank Thee that Thou dost live and reign; that love and affection, faith and hope, are immortal. Comfort us all, especially those who were bound to him by the ties of kinship—wife and daughter—by the blessed promises of our Lord and Master, "and songs of praises we will ever give to Thee," in His name. Amen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will cause the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday to be read.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with and that it be approved without reading.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with and that it be approved without reading. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Journal was accordingly approved.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE MEYER.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of the Hon. ADOLPH MEYER, late a Member of this House from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That, as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay a tribute of respect to the memory of my deceased colleague, Hon. ADOLPH MEYER, late a Representative in Congress from the First District of Louisiana, who died at New Orleans on the 8th of March, 1908, and is honored and mourned by his State and nation.

General MEYER was born at Natchez, Miss., October 19, 1842, and spent his childhood in that State. He matriculated in the University of Virginia, and before graduation left that famous training school of the South to enter the Confederate army in 1862. During the trying times of the greatest civil war the world has ever seen General MEYER played an active, honorable part, serving on the staff of Brig. Gen. John S. Williams, of Kentucky, and holding the rank of adjutant-general when the war closed. In 1879 he was elected colonel of the First Regiment Louisiana National Guard, and in 1881 was appointed by Governor Wiltz brigadier-general of the First Louisiana Brigade, embracing all the uniformed militia in the State. In connection with the organization of the State Militia his services were very efficient.

At the outbreak of the Cuban war General MEYER was urged on account of his military experience and ability, for a position as either brigadier or division commander of Southern volunteers. The following was written by Gen. John S. Williams, of Kentucky, upon whose staff General MEYER served:

To the President.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: I beg leave to recommend to your favorable consideration Mr. ADOLPH MEYER, of Louisiana, for position of division or brigade commander of Southern volunteers.

Mr. MEYER served on my staff during almost the entire civil war. He was preeminent for soldierly qualities, the loftiest courage, fidelity, and endurance. In fact, he seemed a natural-born soldier and commanded the confidence and admiration of the entire command.

I know of no young officer who manifested more military aptitude; his resourcefulness in emergencies and quickness to avail himself of every possible advantage and devotion to duty were unsurpassed.

Mr. MEYER'S experience in actual war has been supplemented by command in the Louisiana Militia and National Guard.

I know the appointment would be a good one and highly acceptable to the Southern people.

With sentiments of the highest regard, I am,
Most respectfully, yours,

JOHN S. WILLIAMS,
Brigadier-General, Afterwards Commanding Kentucky Division.

MAY 2, 1898.

At the close of the civil war General MEYER engaged largely in cotton planting on the Forest plantation, in Concordia Parish, La. Later he entered the cotton factorage and commission house of Meyer, Weis & Co., of New Orleans, and afterwards was a member of the big cotton firm of V. & A. Meyer, which went out of business some years ago. The other member of this firm was his twin brother, Victor. There was the deepest love and devotion between them, and the General was never the same after Victor's death two years ago. Indeed, another brother, Cassius, also died within three months of Victor, and the double loss was a crushing blow to one so fond of his family and so warm-hearted as the General. I could see how deeply he was affected and predicted at the time that he would not survive his beloved brothers many years.

In the fall of 1868 General MEYER married the beautiful and accomplished Miss Rosalie Jonas, daughter of the late Abraham Jonas, of New Orleans, and sister of ex-United States Senator B. F. Jonas, who survives him. Their only child is a daughter, Mrs. Louise M. Swift, widow of the late Capt. Franklin Swift, of the United States Navy. Mrs. Meyer was very popular in Congressional circles and entertained delightfully in her elegant home on Q street. While not much of a society man, General MEYER was very fond of his friends, and nothing pleased him better than to have a small party of intimates around the hospitable board over which his cultured wife presided with such grace and dignity.

In 1890 General MEYER was elected to the Fifty-second Congress, and was reelected every two years since down to and including the term beginning in 1907. The Fifty-second Congress was the Democratic successor to Reed's "billion-dollar" Congress, and he has served eight full and successive terms and one-half of the ninth, ranking eighth in length of service, those older than he being Speaker CANNON, sixteen terms; BINGHAM, of Pennsylvania, fourteen; PAYNE, of New York, eleven; DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, and HEPBURN, of Iowa, ten, and SHERMAN, of New York, nine. Representatives JONES, of Virginia; DE ARMOND, of Missouri, and LIVINGSTON, of Georgia, are the only other Democrats who entered the Fifty-second Congress with General MEYER.

Speaker Crisp assigned General MEYER to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and he has held an important place there ever since, serving under two distinguished Democratic chairmen, Hon. Hillary A. Herbert, of Alabama, who became Secretary of the Navy during President Cleveland's Administration, and Hon. Amos Cummings, of New York. His intimacy with these gentlemen and with Chairman Boutelle, of Maine, as well as with Mr. Metcalf, of California, who left the committee to reenter the Roosevelt Cabinet, and at length to become Secretary of the Navy, together with the assistance given by Senator MCENERY, on the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate, accounts for his success in getting large appropriations for the New Orleans naval station. General MEYER made it his serious business on entering Congress to have a naval station erected on the reserve at Algiers, and to have a floating dry dock tied up there for the accommodation of the heaviest battle ships. He lived to see these things accomplished, and was ever hopeful of witnessing the construction plant in full operation, either building or repairing battle ships.

During his second term in Congress, the Fifty-third, General MEYER held the chairmanship of the Committee on Militia. Having had large experience in matters pertaining to the National Guard, Speaker Crisp picked him from among several to take charge of all militia bills that were introduced.

The Fifty-fourth Congress being Republican, he lost this chairmanship, but was glad to trade his membership on Militia for a place on the District of Columbia, which gave him both social and political prestige in the city of Washington, where he subsequently purchased a home. These three are practically the only committee assignments which General MEYER cared to hold during his seventeen years in Congress. He was faithful in the performance of his duties and labored diligently in the interest not only of New Orleans, but of Louisiana in general.

The services performed by General MEYER, while not notably brilliant, as one might speak of the services of Reed, Randall, and Carlisle, of recent years, or those famous statesmen, Clay, Calhoun, Hayne, and Webster, of an earlier period, were substantial and will not soon be forgotten. He spoke occasionally, perhaps once or twice during a session of Congress, in behalf of some measure or committee report, but he never engaged in partisan debates, in bickerings over parliamentary rulings, or in the vaporings which have made some statesmen notorious, if not ridiculous, because their purpose was simply to make reading matter for their own districts.

General MEYER spoke pleasingly and well, but he had not the voice that could be heard above the ordinary din of the House. His powers of conviction, therefore, lay in what was printed and read in the RECORD, rather than in what was heard on the floor, and in his very persuasive presentation of matters in personal intercourse and in committee rooms, where the real work is done.

His work as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs was of considerable importance. As he was the minority leader, he was always one of the conferees on the naval appropriation bill to settle differences between the two Houses over amendments. In this position he occasionally felt the embarrassment of acting contrary to the wishes of his party, as expressed on the floor, but he was a firm believer in the great advantage that is to be derived from the state of readiness for war and fearlessly supported every recommendation from the White House for more vessels, more stations, or more men.

General MEYER'S special pride was the naval station and dry dock in New Orleans, the largest in the South and equal to any in the country. The State owes this great work to the combined efforts of Senator MCENERY and himself, ably seconded by his New Orleans colleague, Judge DAVEY. He was absolutely tireless in working for this station and never lost sight of it under any circumstances.

He was an expert on naval matters, made many strong speeches on that subject, and his loss will be keenly felt by the Naval Committee.

He took most intelligent and active interest in the appropriations for the levees of the Mississippi River, the 35-foot channel at Southwest Pass of the Mississippi, the New Orleans post-office, the maintenance of the New Orleans mint, the immigration station bill, and everything pertaining to Louisiana. Always at his post and always watchful, applying to his legislative work the fine business training and acumen acquired by his long commercial career, he was very successful in getting results and bore a prominent part in all legislation affecting his State during the last seventeen years. One of his characteristics was his care and attention to requests and suggestions from the people of Louisiana, whether residents of his district or not. All matters received his personal, prompt, and cheerful attention.

His last public work, performed during the closing days of the Fifty-ninth Congress, was to secure $25,000 for the Chalmette monument. He had labored long and hard for this most worthy object, and was delighted when success finally crowned his efforts. In recognition of this service to our nation's history, the Louisiana Historical Society, at a meeting held April 15, passed the following resolution:

NEW ORLEANS, April 15, 1908.

To the members of the Louisiana Historical Society:

Your undersigned committee appointed at the meeting of March 18, 1908, to draft suitable resolutions out of respect to the memory of our deceased member, Gen. ADOLPH MEYER, beg leave to report the following:

"Whereas Divine Providence has removed from our midst our fellow-member, Gen. ADOLPH MEYER, who died on March 8, 1908: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That in the death of Gen. ADOLPH MEYER this society lost one of its most zealous and valued members, whose wise counsel and advice were very beneficial to the society, and tended in a considerable degree to the success of our celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the transfer of Louisiana from France to the United States, on December 20, 1903: Be it further

"Resolved, That by the death of General MEYER the State of Louisiana has lost a Member of Congress whose place will be hard to fill; that in the seventeen years of his service in the National House of Representatives he made a record of which anyone might be proud, and the great dock at New Orleans and the new post-office building, both of which were obtained largely through his efforts, evince in a high degree the work he did and the influence he exerted in the halls of Congress; that his many and steady efforts to procure the completion of the Chalmette Monument on the battlefield of New Orleans, just below the city, were finally crowned with success, when on March 4, 1907, immediately before the adjournment of Congress, the President signed the bill making the necessary appropriation for the purpose; that this particular work was made by General MEYER a work of love, and it was, owing to his failing health, the last public work in which he was engaged, and it is a source of deep regret to all that his life was not spared that he might see in the completion of the monument the culmination of his efforts: Be it further

"Resolved, That in all walks of life, whether as citizen, soldier, or statesman, General MEYER measured full to the responsibilities imposed upon him, and all in all we soon shall not see his like again: Be it further

"Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of the society upon a page specially devoted to that purpose; that an engrossed copy be sent to his bereaved wife and daughter, to whom our heart-felt sympathies are extended; that a copy be sent to his colleagues in Congress, with the request that same be used when memorial services are had in his honor, and that copies be furnished to the press of this city and of Washington."

Respectfully submitted.

W. O. HART, Chairman.

H. M. GILL.

Mr. Speaker, I was very fond of General MEYER and deeply deplore his untimely death. He was only 65 years of age, and with his regular habits and good constitution ought to have lived many years longer. He was always affable, kind, and considerate; ever ready to accommodate a colleague, whether one of the leaders or the most obscure Member of the House. I frequently called on him during the early years of my service, and never in vain. He was a methodical, careful business man; carried those qualities into his legislative work, and, knowing thoroughly what he was about, was able as well as willing to give efficient aid. In his death this House has lost one of its most useful Members, and it is not flattery to say that Louisiana will find it very difficult to fill his place.

Long may the memory of ADOLPH MEYER live in these halls and in the State and nation he served so well. I earnestly hope and believe that the good work done here by him entitles General MEYER to a happy and honorable position in his present home—that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler has ever returned.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which General MEYER was so long a member, at a meeting soon after his death unanimously adopted the following resolutions, which I will read:

Whereas the Hon. ADOLPH MEYER, a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Louisiana, and the oldest member in point of service on the Committee on Naval Affairs, died in the city of New Orleans on the 8th day of March, 1908: Be it therefore

Resolved, That, holding his memory in affectionate regard, we, the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, mourn his untimely death.

Resolved, That as Representative and a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs he exhibited splendid gifts of statesmanship, true patriotism, stainless integrity, and great wisdom in council, and that in his death the country has lost a faithful public servant.

Resolved, That his private life was as pure and gentle as his public career was noble and distinguished, and that we tender to his family the sympathy that flows from hearts which are deeply moved with a great personal sorrow.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be presented to his family and be spread upon the records of the committee and be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the day set aside for eulogies in the House of Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, I myself desire to pay a brief tribute to the memory of him with whom I have been so long associated in the work of building up the Navy. And, first, I desire to speak of his loyalty to his own constituency, for no man, I think, was more industrious and anxious to serve the people who elected him than he, and the many things which he obtained for his city testify to the zeal and success with which he labored at all times for it. The establishment of the navy-yard at Algiers was due entirely to his effort, and I am sure that the great city of New Orleans will always treasure in fondest memory the man who so tirelessly worked for her interest.

But General MEYER's greatest work consisted not so much in serving the constituency which elected him as it did in serving that greater constituency which extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Gulf to the Great Lakes. It was his labors in the upbuilding of the American Navy for which he will be longest remembered. He was the oldest member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. He had served for seventeen years, and no man was more familiar with the great subjects pertaining thereto than himself. The many and able reports on naval subjects which he has written will stand as a monument to his faithfulness, ability, and industry. When he became a member of the Naval Committee we had not a single battle ship in commission and the tonnage of our new Navy was less than 200,000, whereas now, when the pending naval bill shall have become a law, the tonnage of our Navy will reach 850,000. General MEYER can rightfully be called one of the legislative builders of the new Navy, because during the seventeen years of his service upon the committee more than three-fourths of the new American Navy has been built.

I may say that no Member was more intimately acquainted with General MEYER than myself. I saw a great deal of him in the committee room and outside of the Capitol, and I came to know him in a personal and intimate way, and as the years rolled on I came to appreciate his splendid worth. He was the gentlest and kindliest man I ever knew. He seemed to be full of the milk of human kindness. I never knew him to offend anyone, and if he did he would have been the first man to make immediate reparation, and if one offended him he was eager to give to him the consolation of a happy reconciliation. There was no room in his heart for even the slightest resentment.

There is no place, perhaps, where men are more accurately measured than in this forum, but the measure which we give men here is largely the world's measure, and we attribute to them ability as we may note their generalship in handling some measure upon the floor or by their eloquence in debate. Indeed, we are apt to measure men here as they appeal to us, on what might be called the public scale of human action. But the true measure of a man is recorded elsewhere. It is written that "he that overcometh himself is greater than he that taketh a city." It is written, also, that meekness, charity, long suffering, patience, forbearance one with another shall be the instruments of man's measurement in the great hereafter.

General MEYER won his way and accomplished the things which he did through the gentleness of his manner, the sweetness of his character, the persistency of his efforts, the geniality of his disposition, the persuasiveness and logic of his position.

He never won his contests by a brilliant dash or charge, although as captain in the Confederate army he had made them on the field of battle, but here in this forum he won his victories through kindliness and benevolence. If one gave him his ear, he soon had possession of his heart. Such was this gentle and kindly man.

General MEYER, as I have above stated, was a captain in the Confederate army. He was a follower of what is sometimes called the "lost cause." And yet the bravery and courage displayed by the soldiers of the South, no less than that of the soldiers of the North, the Gray as well as the Blue, will be a common heritage to our children and our children's children through all the ages yet to come. We are not far enough removed from the war to measure its full meaning in its just proportions. All must realize that we are but the instruments of the Almighty's plan and purpose in the development of civilization and the liberty of mankind. Liberty is a mighty stream. It reaches back through all the ages that are past, and rushes on through all the ages yet to come, until its mighty current loses itself into the boundless ocean of the Creator's love.

When a century shall have rolled by and the historian of the future comes to write the story of that great war in which so many thousands were engaged on both sides, where so much blood was spilled, where brother fought against brother in fratricidal strife, and where untold misery and suffering has been dragging its weary length all these years down in the deep, dark valley of humiliation and despair—I say, when the historian comes to write the history of that great conflict in the mellow light of history, he will, perchance, simply say, "The North and the South, two brothers, sitting on the lap of the Infinite; one struck the other, and the other returned the blow; yet all the while the tender, loving arms of the Almighty Ruler of nations were around them both."

General MEYER had been tried in the old faith. He was true to the old gospel, and yet he preached the new, the gospel of brotherly love and reconciliation between the two great sections of our common country. He believed that whereas the old North and the old South had crossed swords in war, the new North and the new South should henceforth clasp hands in peace. And so would we all advance this sentiment, in the name of all the dead who sleep upon the hillsides of the North and those as well who sleep where they fell along the banks of many a Southern stream, whose slow and sluggish current seems to murmur a solemn requiem to the dead; in the name of all the living, "whose scars give to modest lips the voice of eulogy;" in the name of Lee, who, at the close of the war, stated that he willingly would have sacrificed all that he had sacrificed in order that this blessed consummation might be brought about; and lastly, in the name of Grant, whose patient suffering on Mount McGregor made the "couch glorious like the cross," where he reiterated again and again those words which he had spoken at the close of the war, "Let us have peace." So say we all of us, a perpetual peace in the everlasting bonds of American brotherhood.

Soldier, statesman, legislative builder of the new American Navy, reconciler of the North and South, lover of mankind, husband, father, friend, associate, thou hast earned thy rest. Sleep on until the angel shall call thee on resurrection morn before the great white throne to receive thy eternal reward.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, Louisiana was the first State carved from the magnificent domain which Jefferson bought from Napoleon for a song, and Missouri was the second. This close kinship, together with their intimate commercial relations, has from the first caused them to entertain deep and abiding sympathy for each other—deeper and more abiding than the average—in every joy and sorrow, in prosperity and in adversity. Being for a long time the only States beyond the great river, they formed the habit of fighting in pairs, and habit at last becomes second nature.

Louisiana has been a member of the Union ninety-six years. There are persons yet living who were old enough to walk and talk when she was admitted into the rare and radiant sisterhood. In the years of her statehood the world has made greater progress in the utilitarian arts and sciences than in any three preceding centuries. To this bewildering progress Louisiana has contributed her part, and of the fruits thereof she enjoys her full share. Her position at the mouths of the Mississippi has from the first given her a prominence greater than her acres, her population, and her wealth entitle her to. The desire to possess the island of Orleans was really what made us a continental power—a world power, for let it never be forgotten that we have been a world power ever since the 30th day of April, 1803. Until we acquired the Floridas, Louisiana was the southernmost of all our possessions, and so different in climate and productions from the rest of our country that she was enveloped in romance to an extraordinary degree, and became the pet theme of poets, orators, and novelists.

The cosmopolitan character of her population has added a perpetual charm to her history.

When I entered Congress, in 1893, Louisiana was represented in the Senate by Donelson Caffery and E. D. White; and in the House by N. C. Blanchard, ROBERT C. DAVEY, H. W. Ogden, S. M. Robertson, ADOLPH MEYER, Andrew Price, and C. J. Boatner. Of that goodly company Judge DAVEY is the only one left with us. Senator Caffery, Mr. Ogden, Judge Boatner, and General MEYER have joined the great majority; Senator White is now Mr. Justice White of the Federal Supreme Court; Mr. Robertson and Mr. Price are now in retirement; Mr. Blanchard, after being a Senator of the United States and supreme judge of Louisiana, is now Governor. This brief recital of facts shows with what startling rapidity the dramatis personæ change here.

To be elected to this House once is a high honer, but to be elected nine times, as was General MEYER, is not only a high honor, but an exceptional one. To prove this it is only necessary to state that of our membership of 391 Members only 4 men have served the same length of time as General MEYER—Judge DEARMOND, of Missouri, Governor HULL, of Iowa, Mr. JONES of Virginia, and Colonel LIVINGSTON of Georgia. Only 6 have served longer—Mr. Speaker CANNON, General BINGHAM, of Pennsylvania, Mr. PAYNE, of New York, Mr. DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, Colonel HEPBURN, of Iowa, and Mr. SHERMAN, of New York. General MEYER served his constituents faithfully and successfully. His constitutents recognized that fact and would probably have kept him here till his death, no matter how long his life.

He was a modest, unassuming gentleman, but a most persistent worker. The suaviter in modo was developed in him to a remarkable extent and enabled him to accomplish much with little noise and with little friction. While representing a great city gives a Member exceptional prestige, it imposes exceptional duties and exceptional labors. General MEYER enjoyed the exceptional prestige and also seemed to enjoy the exceptional duties and labors. He exercised eternal vigilance in looking after the interests of Louisiana in general and of her great metropolis in particular.

He was educated at the University of Virginia; in his youth he served in the Confederate army on the staff of Gen. John S. Williams, of Kentucky, popularly called "Cerro Gordo" Williams. General MEYER rose to the rank of assistant adjutant-general before his beard was grown, and in Congress he rose to be the ranking Democrat on two great committees—Naval Affairs and District of Columbia.

General MEYER died in his sixty-sixth year, worn out in the service of his city, of his State, and of his country.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, in addressing you to-day I bear my last tribute to the memory of one with whom I held associations of peculiar intimacy, social, political, and official, for a period of more than ten years—the late ADOLPH MEYER, of Louisiana. I only wish to say a few simple, honest words of the life, character, and public services of this friend and colleague who has gone to the peaceful slumbers of his tomb.

When my people saw fit to honor and send me here some years ago, it was General MEYER who first extended me a cordial greeting and bade me welcome. From that time he was my friend, and as the years passed on our friendship ripened, and I learned to regard him as an able, scholarly gentleman, devoted to the service of his State and country. His longer legislative experience and kindly nature made him at once my preceptor, and as time passed I sought more and more his counsel and advice.

General MEYER was the possessor of a sunshiny, genial nature, as well as a forgiving disposition, that never harbored revenge. He was a plain, simple man who loved mankind. He was small in stature and his bearing was quiet and unpretending, but his step was steady and firm and was the expression of great will power. Habitually social and kindly disposed, always affable and active was he. Much of his activity was the result of that good nature which prompted him to readily respond to any call of his people; and while his generous, easy nature and pleasing address made his presence especially desirable, his willing kindness emboldened desire to almost demand. Many of his fellow-citizens seemed to consider his services a sort of common property, and this notion he never appeared disposed to change or modify. As a worker he was untiring. For him labor was not a task, but a pleasure. His ambition was to represent his people properly and conscientiously. In committee, on the floor, at all times he was keenly alive to their interest, and never let an opportunity to serve them pass neglected.

Sixty-five years ago, on the banks of the great Mississippi River, at the city of Natchez, General MEYER was born. There he passed his childhood and boyhood days, a part of the time in school, so that when he had attained the age of 18 he was ready to enter the University of Virginia. For two years he zealously confined himself to intellectual pursuits in that famed old institution. But in 1862, unable to longer restrain that enthusiasm which stirred within him for the defense of his country, he was impelled to join the Confederate ranks and fight for country's sake. It is needless to dwell on his record, other than to say it was an enviable one. On enlisting he was assigned to the staff of Gen. John S. Williams, of Kentucky. There he served through the years of war, at the end of which he held the rank of assistant adjutant-general. Not many years ago his old commander, General Williams, testified to the young soldier's worth in these words:

> He was preeminent for soldierly qualities—the loftiest courage, fidelity, and endurance.

His history in service is linked and written with that of the army of Lee; its history is his history, and its fame his fame; its valorous deeds are the sum of the many brave deeds of the thousands of gallant men who, with him, went forth at the call of his country to battle for her defense. When the cause for which he had contended was lost and his country's flag forever furled in gloom and glory he turned his face to the South and took for his new home no less a place than Louisiana.

There he stood with other Confederates through all the dark days of reconstruction—days more trying than war, more humiliating than defeat. Ever hopeful, he strove with untiring might and effort to redeem the Southland from shameful misrule and political strife and to rebuild that shattered land.

For several years General MEYER lived for the most part on a plantation not far from New Orleans, and about the year 1870 he became a resident of that city. There he followed commercial pursuits, and by his thrift, ability, and honest efforts quickly found success. Even while he was busiest in his own work General MEYER was ever ready to respond to the call of his fellow-citizens in city, State, or nation. To reorganize and build up the State militia he deemed essential. Enlisting in this work, he unsparingly gave to it his time and the fruits of his Confederate service, and just prior to his election to Congress he was made commander of all the Louisiana troops. It was duty rather than desire that prompted General MEYER to accept this charge, for of war he had had sufficient.

Eighteen years ago the people of New Orleans, appreciating the sterling worth of ADOLPH MEYER, saw fit to send him to this House as one of their Congressmen. So well, so faithfully, did he serve them, guard and protect their interests, that his service here has been unbroken for all these eighteen years. The fruits of his labors are many, notable, and worthy. Largely to his energetic efforts and tireless work are due the establishment of the great naval station in New Orleans; the system of jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi, as well as levees to hold in check the waters of that great river; the maintenance of the New Orleans mint, and the appropriations for a new Federal building for that city. His last good deed, his last work in this House, and in which I had the privilege and pleasure of being closely associated with him, was the securing of an appropriation of $25,000 at the past session for the completion of a monument to the soldiers who fell in the battle of New Orleans in the war of 1812.

To Mrs. Richardson, president of the United States Daughters of 1776 and 1812, and her splendid organization of patriotic women is due the happy consummation of this plan to place a fitting shaft to the memory of those fearless men of Jackson who saved the day at New Orleans. This organization of ladies raised much of the money expended in the partial erection of this monument. They interested me in their work, and when Representative Story, of Louisiana, introduced a bill in the State legislature to donate the grounds and unfinished monument to the United States, I went to the State capital and, with Mr. Story, secured the passage of his measure. Besides this, the Daughters have obligated themselves to assume the care of the monument and contiguous grounds, relieving the Government of all expense and responsibility.

This battle, this monument, was the theme of General MEYER's last speech in this House. It was on the anniversary of the battle, January 8, 1907, that he appropriately, eloquently, and forcibly urged his fellow Members to memorialize this battlefield commensurately with the splendid deeds enacted there.

Such achievements as this; his great work for his people and his State; his generous soul; the righteousness of his daily life; his sympathetic nature; his deeds of kindness, charity, and generosity will rear a monument to his memory more lasting than stone, more enduring than bronze.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, we have met to-day to pay a last sad tribute of love and respect to one whose voice was heard for many years in these legislative halls, but who now sleeps the sleep everlasting 'neath the balmy skies of his well-beloved Louisiana.

I first met Gen. ADOLPH MEYER during the Fifty-sixth Congress. He was then serving his fifth term in this House. He had acquired an enviable position among his colleagues. He was regarded as a man of great industry, possessing the soul of honor. He knew the right and always dared maintain it.

One of our American poets has said:

So many gods, so many creeds.
So many roads that wind and wind,
While just the art of being kind
Is all this great world needs.

Our lamented colleague knew "the art of being kind." I do not think that he had it in his nature to speak a harsh or unkind word. He was always courteous, affable, companionable. He would not knowingly have wounded the feelings of the humblest of his fellow-creatues. Indeed, it well can be said of him that—

None knew him but to love him,
None named him but to praise.

He had been ailing for many months when the final summons came, and it was a matter of deep regret to all of his friends that illness prevented his presence in the Sixtieth Congress. As the ranking minority member of the Committee on Naval Affairs he had taken an active interest in the upbuilding of the American Navy. He was proud of all the traditions that attached to that branch of the Government's service. His ambition was to see the American Navy the equal of any in the world. He was particularly solicitous for the welfare of "the men behind the guns," and was ever ready to give his voice and his vote to better their condition.

Coming, as he did, from the city of New Orleans, the metropolis of the South, he was especially well qualified to sit upon the Committee on the District of Columbia. As a member of that committee he readily championed any measure that tended to make the city of Washington the most magnificent capital in the world.

His colleagues on both committees will miss his genial presence, will listen in vain for his words of counsel.

His was a busy life during the sixty-five years he was permitted to walk among men. Born in 1842, he was scarcely come to man's estate when the great struggle of the civil war commenced. He naturally followed the fortunes of his beloved State of Louisiana during that momentous period, and as an officer on the staff of Gen. John S. Williams, of the Confederate army, he rendered signal service to the cause which he believed to have been right. But with the coming of peace he gladly returned to the pursuits of peace. He did not mourn for the lost cause, but immediately set to work to upbuild the industries of a reunited country.

As a planter and as a business man fortune smiled upon him, and he reaped the reward of industry in his commercial enterprises. In these days of high finance, when men of large affairs in the business world are not always overscrupulous as to the methods employed in accumulating wealth, it shall always be said to the everlasting credit of General MEYER that his business career was both honorable and creditable.

His people, recognizing his sterling qualities as a citizen and as a man, his splendid abilities, his honesty, his probity, his integrity, his patriotism, elected him as their Representative to the Fifty-second Congress, and wisely continued him in that position till the day of his death. In having thus honored him, they honored themselves; for if ever a Representative sought to serve his constituency faithfully, zealously, patriotically, Gen. ADOLPH MEYER did. And his people recognized his great worth—for when the news spread among them that the Grim Reaper had cut down their friend and neighbor when he was at the very fullness of his powers there was universal sorrow in his city and his State.

In the closing years of his life he was especially interested in the improvement of the Mississippi River—the great Father of Waters—whose improvement is especially important to the city of New Orleans. One of his last utterances on the floor of this House was in relation to this subject. He had the matter close at heart, and it must have been a great solace to him during the long, trying days of his suffering and illness to have learned that the question of the improvement of the great waterways of our country had grown to be one of the vital issues and was engaging the attention of the progressive men of the entire nation, regardless of politics or partisanship.

General MEYER was an optimist. During his long public career he had faced many problems, he had participated in many debates, he had helped to solve many great questions of national policy; but during all of that time he had marched forward and never backward. There was never a pessimistic note in any of his speeches. He realized that the world was advancing, that mankind was growing better and better. He went about among his fellow-men with a smile and not with a scowl. He was a man of high ideals, and in his own life he tried to live up to those ideals.

It is these qualities that made him a gentle, a devoted husband, a loving father, and a faithful and loyal friend. He is no more. He has gone to that long sleep that knows no waking, and all is well with him. And we, who were permitted to know him in his lifetime, who loved and honored and respected him, will always cherish his memory.

Mr. PUJO. Mr. Speaker—

* * * The race is not to the swift nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favor to men of skill; but time and chance happeneth to them all.

Mr. Speaker, this great philosophic truth, uttered nearly three thousand years ago by the wisest of men, was well exemplified by the traits of character and life efforts of our late colleague, Gen. ADOLPH MEYER, of the First Louisiana District, of whose memory we have met to-day to accord words of commendation and regret.
